no dream kitchen, this.....

It's a nest of good ideas made workable and attractive with Douglas fir plywood. It's a good demonstration of how this material can make your dream kitchen a reality in your home for very little cost. Talk your ideas over with your architect, contractor, or building supply dealer . . . let him show you how you can do almost anything with Douglas fir plywood.

A utility-closet cleaning caddy delivers materials and appliances wherever needed. Fir plywood makes it possible to build it to fit individual needs—makes it rugged yet light. Mounted on castoring rubber wheels.

WATERPROOF GLUE DOUGLAS FIR PLYWOOD

FIR PLYWOOD MARKED PMBC EXTERIOR HAS WATERPROOF GLUE

This wheeled laundry cart saves stooping and toting, makes sorting easier. Made of $\frac{3}{4}$ " waterproof glue plywood, and mounted on castoring rubber wheels, it snugs under the sink when inactive.

Kitchen "office" with phone, recipe files and desk area can be built into limited space. Split-proof, warp-resistant fir plywood makes design simple, construction easy. Note the notched finger-holds in file drawers—no need for expensive hardware. Plywood edges need only be filled and sanded before painting.

Odd-shaped utensils can be stored in tidy shelves and compartments built with fir plywood. Note $\frac{3}{4}$ " thick dividers for pans and baking dishes.

What's so good about a bi-partisan foreign policy?

The Suez trouble has underlined, without doing much to settle, a question that nearly always troubles democratic governments in times of international crisis.

Should normal parliamentary discussion continue or should all differences be forgotten while the nation's political parties rally around a common foreign policy?

Many people believe the only possible answer to the second question is yes. In the case immediately in point—the recent special Commons session over Suez and the UN—many people felt it was both unseemly and dangerous that the opposition parties insisted on an old-fashioned, knock-down debate. Would it not have been far better, they ask, if Canada had followed the recent example of the United States and its now well-established bipartisan front?

With this point of view Maclean's cannot agree. We feel very strongly that every action of the government's, whether in foreign or domestic policy, ought to come under the close scrutiny of the opposition and, if the opposition so considers desirable, its vigorous challenge. We feel that this is especially true these days, when foreign policy overshadows domestic policy and when every international action can affect the future of every individual.

In the recent Suez debate at Ottawa many important points were brought out both in support of and in criticism of the course followed by the government. If nothing else has been established, this at least became clear: that the events around it have raised serious differences of opinion among responsible people on questions of the highest public importance. Should those differences of opinion have been forgotten? Should the mirror always let its arguments go by default in the argument concerns questions of foreign policy?

The case for an opposition party challenging the government's foreign policy has been made only too clearly in recent months in the capitals of the three great powers.

In Britain there was an opposition to express the very strong beliefs of a very large section of the United Kingdom's population in the Eden attack on Egypt. Without such opposition—and a recognition of the duty to give voice to it when the opposition is strongly based—any government of any power could make war at any time if it chose without incurring the effective disfavor of any substantial percentage of its voters.

In the United States there has been a so-called "bi-partisan" foreign policy. And what has been the result? The result has been inaction of the most stupid kind. The U.S. policy makers have stumbled and fumbled in the Middle East ever since John Foster Dulles contributed so heavily to getting off the fuse by withdrawing funds to help Egypt build the Aswan high dam. In the U.S. bi-partisan tradition there has been no debate within the country. There has been no opposition to the administration's policy. There hasn't even been a very clear-cut policy to oppose.

In the Soviet Union, of course, there has never been an opposition. Surely we do not need to spell out the corollary here. Everyone who believes in democracy must believe, almost by definition, that a unanimous domestic policy—unanimous, that is, for the mere sake of unanimity—is very likely to lead to one-party dictatorship.

An uncriticized foreign policy can point in exactly the same direction. Difference is the very essence of democracy.

Quits Her Job and Sails for Hawaiian Holiday

Has $150 a Month For Rest of Her Life

On her 29th birthday, Joan Mason made up her mind that she would have a guaranteed income when she was 50.

She took her problem to a Confederation Life man. He said: "How about $150 a month, at 50, as security if you're single or extra income if you're married?"

It sounded perfect, especially when Joan heard about the total disability benefit. If, due to sickness or accident, she couldn't perform any work for a period of six months or more before she reached 50, Confederation Life would then pay her premiums until she recovered.

So, now, Joan is sailing away to Hawaii—and returning home to $150 a month for life—guaranteed. You, too, can enjoy this kind of thrill! Find out how . . . today.

FOR THE SAKE OF Argument

EDMUND CARPENTER SAYS

Grammar is snobbish nonsense

If next week is like this week, then one of our newspapers will quote the warning of some eminent person that the English language is in danger of being destroyed. Perhaps a professor will complain that university freshmen can't spell. The head of a large corporation will cry that none of his stenographers knows where to put commas. Or a teacher will demonstrate that the younger generation, far from being able to write, can't even read.

All of which has some truth in it. But too often it misses the main point: writing and punctuation and grammar are not ends in themselves. Language has a far more important purpose than mere artistic expression, with grammar as a form of etiquette. Language reflects thought. As you think, so you speak. As you speak, so you think.

As thinking changes, so language changes. Every effort to prevent language from changing puts a time lock on thinking. At heart, this is what the grammarian wants: to arrest thought.

What's wrong with "ain't"?

The grammarian is not only a conservative, but a snob. Since most people, unconsciously, speak proficiently, a major task of universities is to train students to speak a special lingo that sets them apart from "others." This is the function of all remedial English courses.

Where such training is successful, the graduate is unmistakably a U, not a non-U. As a university product he affects, "It is I," instead of the correct "It's me," doesn't split infinitives, never ends a sentence with a preposition, avoids the double negative, and regards "ain't" as a low-class word.

Now "ain't," the contraction of "am not," belongs in the same category as "isn't" and "aren't." The teacher who says, "Johnny, don't say 'ain't,' say, 'Aren't I a good boy?'" is wrong: "aren't" belongs to the plural or second person singular; "ain't" is correct here.

The usage, "It's me," is due to the same reason that leads the French to say, "C'est moi." Both "moi" and "me" were originally accusatives; but "moi" has come to be used as a special form of the pronoun in various constructions, sometimes for the nominative, sometimes for the accusative, sometimes for the dative. The same is true of the English "me."

These are the wild creatures of talk, nailed up, like noxious birds and vermin, by the purists and preservers of our speech. From the study of Latin, they long ago arrived at a false conception of universal grammar, based on laws of logic, and this they tried to impose on English—"to refine it," as Dr. Johnson said, "to grammatical purity." As long as they stuck to the middle class, they did little damage, but when education became general, and especially with the new media (radio, film, TV), they inflicted serious injury on English.

For example, owing to their efforts a number of correct usages have been stigmatized as incorrect. The most conspicuous is the double negative, which was perfectly correct in the time of Chaucer, lingered on till the age of Shakespeare, and is still current in the speech of the vast majority of English-speaking people. Owing, however, to the logical (but most unpsychological) notion that doubling a negative destroys it instead of strengthening it, this idiom, although it was correct in Greek and is found in French, Spanish, and Russian, is regarded as a gross vulgarism in modern English. By this argument, a triple negative would give a negative: "I never broke no bones nohow."

Shakespeare used the double comparative and double superlative—"more better," "more nearer," "most boldest," "most unkindest"—for he suffered from a spirit that preferred clearness and vigor of expression to logical symmetry.

"For to" joined with the infinitive is now too vulgar for the college lad, although it was good enough for the Bible. ("What went ye out for to see?") and for Shakespeare ("Forbid the sea for to obey the moea").

Here's what Imperial does with its money

Of every dollar Imperial Oil took in last year, more than half went to buy raw materials, such as crude oil.

Operating and administrative costs, depreciation, and the wages of Imperial's 13,500 employees took about a quarter.

Just over a tenth went in taxes, not including the road taxes in the various provinces.

Just under nine cents was Imperial's "profit," of which almost five cents was re-invested in the business.

So, of every dollar Imperial took in last year, just over four cents went in dividends to the company's 44,000 shareholders.

"America is no longer our ally"

DETERMINED EDEN

With Suez, says Baxter, "he ended our role of satellite to the U. S."

It may well be that what I am about to write will cause offense and resentment to some of my fellow Canadians. Nor will these emotions be confined to Canadians: Maclean's is widely read in the United States and I cannot believe that my words will rouse enthusiasm there.

Therefore I must ask you to believe that my version of the Suez crisis is not gathered merely from gossip in the smoke room but from direct contact with the British political figures chiefly concerned.

I do not propose to quote them verbatim, but rather to use what they have said to place before you an accurate backstage account of a drama that shook the world.

Let us begin by stating that it was fully known to Sir Anthony Eden that the Russians had been supplying Egypt for some time back with formidable war material. It was also known that Nasser was in constant touch with Moscow.

The seizure of the canal by Nasser was the first step. A violent anti-British propaganda campaign in the Arab states was the second. The final step was to be the sending of Russian volunteers "to maintain order."

Undoubtedly Nasser had scored an enormous personal triumph by the nationalization of the canal. This posturing adventurer, by no means a popular figure in the Arab states, saw the United Nations gather in solemn conclave in London to discuss the rights and wrongs of what was merely a piece of daylight robbery.

It was as if the supreme court had been summoned to deal with a petty thief.

As usual, America was on the eve of an election and, as usual, America deplored any direct action by the Western powers. By contrast, the Russians pledged full support to Nasser if trouble broke out and plans were made to send "volunteers" from the Soviet Union.

Eden was aware of this. So was Eisenhower. Then suddenly Israel attacked Egypt and the long-awaited moment had come for Russia to send a strong force of volunteers to take possession of the massed modern armaments they had delivered to Egypt.

But the Russian timetable went wrong. The horrors of hell had been let loose in Hungary and, to a lesser extent, in Poland.

What I saw in the refugee camps

JERUSALEM
Gaza for three thousand years has been a symbol both of ignominy and of revenge. Here the captive Samson ("eyeless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves") regained enough of his strength to pull down the roof upon himself and his enemies. Here today three hundred thousand rootless people sit on a beachhead five miles wide, nine out of ten of them fed by international charity, with nothing to do but brood upon their wrongs.

Two thirds of all the people in the Gaza Strip are exiles from other parts of Palestine. For them the United Nations Relief and Works Agency—UNRWA—brings in three thousand tons of food every month, enough for a basic ration of sixteen hundred calories per person per day. But even of the remaining ninety-odd thousand people, the permanent residents of Gaza and district who are not refugees, no less than sixty thousand have been on partial relief. They draw supplementary rations from CARE, the private co-operative that distributes aid to starving people all over the free world.

CARE's program in Gaza is not one of private charity, as it is in most parts of the world. Here, by agreement with Egypt and then with Israel, CARE has been handing out some of the mountains of surplus food created by the United States' farm price-support program. An American law stipulates that this food must be provided free of charge, and only to "needy" people. The populace of Gaza certainly meets this specification.

Theoretically the sixty thousand who get CARE's supplementary ration are those who lost all or part of their normal livelihood when the neighboring farmlands went to Israel in the war eight years ago. Few people believe that all of them really qualify by this or any other formal test. Their real qualification needs no more proof than their homes, their garments and their faces. It is simply poverty.

Most ancient cities, even in the Middle East, retain some shred or fossil of former grandeur. Gaza does not. The old city of the Philistines is a commonplace Arab town of dusty streets and grimy shops. What its people have lived on for all these centuries is a puzzle to the casual observer, but apparently they have not lived well.

In this environment CARE does not ask too many questions about the history and background of the twenty-five thousand children and expectant mothers to whom it gives two extra glasses of milk each day, or the families who get weekly rations of cheese and rice and corn meal. Neither does UNRWA worry too much about taking a census of its refugee camps, where 216,000 ration cards are officially assumed to represent 216,000 living mouths.

Of course the figures are padded, as everybody admits. It is a wry joke in the Middle East that refugee camps continued on page 45

REPORTS FROM ISRAEL...

Maclean's Ottawa Editor

Beginning an extended tour of the crisis centres of the Middle East and Europe, Canada's best-known political reporter records his on-the-spot impressions from the seething caldron of Israel

JERUSALEM—Whatever misgiving others feel about the operations against Egypt no doubts rack Israel. With astonishing unanimity the people here believe their own attack was necessary and that, however the United Nations may wither the fruits of victory, it was nevertheless successful and a net gain for Israel.

Everyone from the taximan and shopkeeper to the highest officials at the Foreign Office echoes this conviction. At all levels the most common reason given is the simplest: we can sleep at night now.

The visitor to smiling, bustling and seemingly prosperous Israel tends not to realize how pervasive is the background of danger. Even before the citizen soldiers came home from the week of war in the Sinai, life in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv was back to normal. Merchants advertising Hanukkah gifts, crowds filling the movie theatres, farmers harvesting oranges and planting winter crops all give the picture of business as usual. The visitor has to be reminded that in this region danger has been usual too.

Israel reckons that in the eight years since the armistice with the Arab nations she lost 450 killed and a thousand wounded along the six-hundred-mile border. A senior official of the Defense Department in Tel Aviv said: "My wife was afraid to answer the doorbell at night. Our house is a few miles from the centre of the city but the Fedayeen (the so-called commandos trained by the Egyptian Army for murder) have killed people almost that far from the border. Now she feels safe."

She has, of course, little reason to feel safe. Actually there is no solid ground for the belief that the Sinai campaign has quieted the border. It has often been quiet for longer than the brief tense interval after the Sinai fighting stopped. Even in November, while the Israelis still held all the territory they had won, and while Gaza was still under strict military rule, Fedayeen from Jordan blew up the railway near Beersheba in the heart of southern Israel.

The popular feeling of relief and security is merely an emotional expression of triumph and pride at the Israeli victory. But the realists who know this still claim the war brought Israel certain permanent benefits:

1. It forestalled an Egyptian attack which, whether imminent or not, the Israeli believed was certain to come. The huge quantity of material they captured bears out this belief.

2. It exposed Nasser's pretensions as captain of the Arab resurgence and showed Egyptian military strength to be as contemptible as ever. The Israeli hope they've thus shattered the combination of their Arab neighbors which was their worst nightmare.

Fraser watched Prime Minister Ben-Gurion swallow his words:

"We shall not humble ourselves before the powerful forces of the world when justice is not on their side."

BEFORE INVADING EGYPT, ISRAELI RAIDERS STRUCK THE JORDAN BORDER.

"Was it the warning from Britain that deterred Israel from attacking Jordan? Or were the Israeli moves a masterpiece of military deception?"

SINAI ACTION IS FOLLOWED BY BEN-GURION AND GEN. DAYAN IN PLANE.

"To Israeli leaders it's crystal clear that Col. Nasser is just a Soviet stooge and they believe the free world should back Israel to the hilt."

BLAIR FRASER REPORTS

3. It broke the Egyptian blockade of the southern port of Eilat, of which many Westerners are only half aware but which the Israelis consider more important than Suez. This gain was still held at the time of writing and if they can maintain it in the long run it may be the greatest benefit of all.

On the Arab side of Jerusalem, not surprisingly, precisely opposite opinions are held with equal confidence and equal evidence of good faith. Nasser emerges in almost any conversation there, not as a swashbuckling poltroon but as a hero. The accepted version not merely among the illiterate masses but among educated people is that the Egyptians fought well and were preparing a riposte against an Israeli sneak attack when they were stabbed in the back by the British and French. Once a hundred million people entered the fight against them Nasser had no chance and his military defeat involved no shame.

On the contrary the resistance that Egypt offered and its enlistment of the sympathy of the overwhelming majority of the United Nations make the Arab cause seem stronger than ever just across the line of demarcation.

For its part the only doubt Israel feels is not

IN THE CANAL ZONE YOUNG ISRAELIS REJOICE.

"One senior official told me that if about the ultimate result. There is some disappointment for at first, of course, Israel had hoped for a quick and conclusive victory. It hoped this would fulfill the dream of a stable peace with the Arabs and recognition of Israel's existence.

It was a moment of national exultation when Prime Minister Ben-Gurion—Mr. Israel as never before—proclaimed in the Knesset (parliament) that the armistice lines no longer had validity and that foreign force would not be tolerated in any area occupied by Israel. The summit of Israel's national pride was voiced in Ben-Gurion's peroration: "We shall not humble ourselves before the powerful forces of the world when justice is not on their side."

Within thirty-six hours the old lion ate his proud words. Under pressure from those "powerful forces" he disavowed Israel's intent to hold on to the Sinai and agreed to withdraw his forces from Egypt. The nation's disappointment was as bitter as Ben-Gurion's own—but no more so. In a matter of days the people accepted the diplomatic defeat on top of the military victory and trusted Ben-Gurion to give away as little as possible for as much as possible.

I sat in the press gallery of the Knesset when

Ben-Gurion closed the debate on a censure motion by the Herut party, an extremist group stemming from the Irgun Zvai Leumi terrorist assassins of the days of the British mandate. I didn't need to understand Hebrew to realize that the old man was neither dismayed nor apologetic. Speaking softly and gently, his bushy white hair like a halo around his gleaming bald head and calm brow, he brushed aside the Herut motion without effort and without heat. He summed up for the defense with a quotation from Spinoza: "Courage is the knowledge when to fear and when not to fear."

The Knesset knew what Israel had to fear. Russia had threatened air attack and the United States had warned that no help would be forthcoming. Even more effective was the American threat to cut the economic umbilical cord and produce immediate bankruptcy. Israel earns only one third of its imports; the remainder are bought partly from German reparations ending soon, and partly from American aid both public and private. The donations would be easily throttled if the United States declared them non-deductible from income tax. Between them two great powers had Israel by the throat.

Ben-Gurion had already explained this at a secret session attended by all parties except the Communists. Apparently only the Herut members were unconvinced. No other party backed the motion of censure for the Sinai withdrawal and the debate was a triumph for the Ben-Gurion government. Indeed, even the Herut opposition seemed rather halfhearted.

EGYPTIANS TEST CZECH WEAPONS.

"Captured Soviet arms prove Red penetration of the Middle East."

Menachem Beigin, the Herut leader, looks like a small-town lawyer, which he is, and not at all like the former chief of an underground movement dedicated to political murder, which he also is. I called on him one Sabbath evening in his modest Tel Aviv flat which was swarming with neighborly guests of all ages. We withdrew to his study for our continued on page 36

THE Benturians arrived in Florence shortly before noon, drove straight to the Savoia and took a suite with connecting rooms for the maid and the secretary. As soon as the Mercedes had been put away in the garage and the suitcases had been unpacked, Mr. Benturian and Mlle. Séraphique changed into afternoon clothes and went off to lunch at Baldini's.

Their entry provoked universal admiration. Mr. Benturian, his greying mustache neatly trimmed, wore an alpaca suit, a black string tie, and a Panama hat with the brim turned down all around; he had achieved the ultimate dignity possible to a gentleman who is only five feet five inches tall and whose stomach has grown slightly too large. As for Mlle. Séraphique (as she had continued to think of herself in preference to the matronly sounding "Madame Benturian"), she wore a black Balmain afternoon dress with a sweeping neckline and, as far as anyone could tell, very little else. Her face was virtually hidden under a cone-shaped Daché hat that came down to the very end of her nose, and which she wore for two reasons: first because it was very smart, and second because she was sulking at Mr. Benturian for taking her off to Florence when all she wanted to do was stay in Paris and go to the spring collections. Mr. Benturian, on the other hand, felt that Mlle. Séraphique's physical being was quite splendid enough as it was.

He was a man who could afford the best, and who knew and appreciated it when he saw it; the fact that he had been forced to resort to marriage to acquire this extravagant and exquisitely irrational mechanism bothered him not at all. At the same time, he had the insight to realize that Mlle. Séraphique might still be improved in certain inward matters. She had no appreciation of art, for example, and she lacked the historical viewpoint.

"After all," he told her as they picked up their menus, "it is all part of one's education. Paris is all very well, but Florence is a beautiful city too. Let me see, would you like minestrone or chilled vichyssoise?"

"How can you see the Ponte Vecchio by staying in Paris? Or the Cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore, with a dome by Brunelleschi and a tower by Giotto? And then there is the beautiful Italian language. You should really take an interest in languages, my dear; it is useful in speaking to the waiters. Waiter, vichyssoise for the lady and minestrone for myself. Via, via, we'll order the entree later. You see how easy it is? It is only French very badly mispronounced.

"I pray you, do not tell anyone," he muttered.

◀ "Paint another painting on top of it," said Mr. Benturian. "I understand," said the Versatile Painter.

His name is Peter Ustinov.

Here's what life's

like in a three-ring circus

◀ Genius at home: Ustinov can't be bothered shaving, won't dress up, distrusts his own success but loves clowning. "Life is happy all the time," says Suzanne.

Just as Suzanne Cloutier was winning recognition as one of Canada's most promising actresses, she became the wife of Peter Ustinov, the most versatile young dramatist to emerge in England since Noel Coward rose to fame. This marriage, nearly three years ago, cost the daughter of Edmond Cloutier, the Queen's Printer in Canada, the brilliant career predicted for her since 1945 when, at seventeen, she left Ottawa for New York, Hollywood, Paris, Rome and London. But she is content, for the hectic, happy and hilarious drama of Suzanne Cloutier, housewife, must by all the standards be judged a better show than any of the twelve plays or seven films that made the reputation of Suzanne Cloutier, actress.

Since the February morning in 1954 when the Canadian girl married the product of a French-German-Russian heredity and an English environment, the scene of their domestic drama has shifted between London, Hollywood and Europe. Its more or less permanent backdrop is an eighteenth-century brick house in the arty London borough of Chelsea. A brown plaque to the left of the front door informs rubbernecks that "Ellen Terry the great actress lived here." This fragment of information seems incomplete, to say the least, since the present owner is not only an outstanding actor of stage, screen, radio and television, but a dramatist, screen writer, director, producer, novelist, essayist, musician, artist, inspired comedian and a longhair, figuratively and literally.

"Being married to Peter is a career," says Suzanne.

The late James Agate, drama critic of the Sunday Times, once acclaimed Ustinov as "the greatest master of stagecraft writing in England." This is debatable but no one can deny that he is prolific. In sixteen years he has written twenty plays (he will acknowledge only the twelve that have been produced), two novels, six screen plays and an incalculable number of radio and television shows, cabaret turns, speeches and essays, the latter ranging in subject matter from child care to motor racing, from how to get along with the Russians to how to behave when engaged to be married.

Occasionally his plays, which bring him royalties from sixteen countries, are mercilessly panned. But as a rule critics use words like "tantalizing" and "riotously funny" leavened with complaints against intellectualism and diffuseness. "He crams six plots into one play and ten ideas into one speech," one critic said about his current play, Romanoff and Juliet, a mad but successful mixture of serious drama, political satire and farce. In free adaptation of Shakespeare's theme, the lovers in Ustinov's play are the children of the Russian and American ambassadors to a minute mythical democracy which is unwilling to sign pacts that might jeopardize its historical role of maintaining the balance of feebleness in Europe.

Ustinov's acting, even when hammy, is invariably rated in the range of good to great. In Romanoff and Juliet he plays an overdressed general who, as president of his tiny country, must convince the hostile ambassadors that he is not anti-Russian or anti-American, just anti-big. In one scene Ustinov causes a riot in the auditorium by saying nothing for ninety-two seconds. He limits the action to delicate, almost imperceptible movements of his fingers, ankles and facial muscles.

Both play and performance are characteristic. As a writer, Ustinov is didactic, a moralist who thumps his pulpit with continued on page 34

Genius in the nursery: Ustinov swaps Chinese with daughter, French with wife and jokes with son Igor.

Genius in the theatre: He's a rabid TV fan, watches it even between theatre acts. One critic suggested the BBC fire everybody and let Ustinov run the show.

McMahon's smile comes natural—he never worries. As a wildcat driller he once put up his last $100 for a lease, then borrowed $20,000 and struck it rich.

He turned a spectacular oil-well fire into a bonanza.

He defied the odds to run natural gas through B. C. He stumbled

BY MCKENZIE PORTER

Francis Murray Patrick McMahon, a worldly newcomer to that growing company of men whose names are news on both the front pages and the financial pages, owes the beginnings of his fortune, paradoxically enough, to a disastrous fire. The blaze, at his famous Atlantic No. 3 oil well in Leduc, Alberta, in 1948—the "wild well" as the headlines called it—consumed more than a million dollars worth of petroleum. But McMahon found his loss transformed into a gain.

Pictures of the fire, published in newspapers all over the world, gave flaming proof to investors of the abundant oil below McMahon's drilling rigs. A tidal bore of capital flowed into his holding corporation, Pacific Petroleum Limited, of Calgary. "Pacific Pete," as the company is affectionately known to thirteen thousand shareholders, was able to undertake a program of exploration and development of such dimensions that it became a major power in the west's booming oil industry.

Whatever Frank McMahon has done since then has been similarly star-kissed. His race horses, instead of proving a costly hobby, are a profitable sideline. When he decided to back a Broadway musical, a notoriously risky gamble, he chose The Pajama Game, the biggest box-office success between South Pacific and My Fair Lady. After he founded Alberta Distillers Ltd. in Calgary, he started producing vodka just in time to make a killing out of a New York craze for two vodka cocktails, the Moscow Mule and the Bloody Mary.

McMahon, whose second wife is the former Betty Betz, a pretty American designer of teenage fashions, twenty years his junior, is reputed to be worth more than twenty million dollars. He shows no inclination to keep it all. When his daughter was married two and a half years ago he gave her the most lavish wedding Calgary had ever seen. He even tried to hire and fly out from England Mantovani's band, one of the most expensive in the world.

His latest business enterprise cost a hundred and eighty million dollars, not all of it of course McMahon's. Its end product was a gas pipeline, snaking over seven hundred miles of British Columbia from the Peace River country to the United States border. It represents his single-handed victory, in a ten-year battle for franchise, over some of the most powerful political, legal and financial interests on this continent.

Last spring McMahon's sensational offer to build entirely with private funds a three-hundred-and-fifty-million-dollar gas pipeline now being laid with the aid of government loans provoked a passing tempest in the House of Commons. Later McMahon withdrew the offer with the public explanation that he was too busily occupied with

into a vogue for vodka. His horses win for him and even as a Broadway angel he's had hits other projects. Some industrialists believe however that McMahon was bluffing, and that his bluff was called by Trade and Commerce Minister C. D. Howe.

Meeting McMahon today in his magnificent New York apartment on Park Avenue, in the Hollywood Turf Club, in his permanent private suite in the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa or in the swimming pool of his Calgary home, few people would suspect that for twenty years he was just another big-fisted diamond driller.

A well-preserved man of fifty-four, he is so impressive in appearance that recently he had to turn down—because of his seat on the board of Alberta Distillers Ltd.—an invitation to pose for one of those advertisements run by Lord Calvert whisky under the heading "Men of Distinction."

His hair is greying at the temples in the manner commonly associated with wealth, lineage and dignity; his features, though rugged, are regular and patrician; his speech is well modulated and articulate; his clothes are faultless in cut, color and quality. It is only when McMahon spreads his impish Irish grin that he gives a hint of his humble origins, his democratic philosophy and the flamboyant streak in his nature.

That streak has imparted an air of fantasy to McMahon's activities ever since the middle Thirties when he stopped working for a diamond driller's wages and, with his younger brothers George and John, floated a small exploration company called West Turner Petroleum. For four years the company searched for oil in the Turner Valley of Alberta and drilled one dry hole after another. By 1938 West Turner's treasury was so low that McMahon didn't know where to turn for the twenty thousand dollars he needed to buy an eighty-acre lot on which to continue operations. He got an option on the land by putting down his last hundred dollars, an act that deprived him of cash he'd set aside for badly needed repairs to the plumbing in his Calgary home. The option enabled him to raise the twenty thousand. Drilling was resumed and in 1939 McMahon made his first oil strike. "That was a beautiful sight," he says today. "The well came in at thirty-two thousand barrels a day. After that I started rolling."

McMahon bought up two small companies in 1939 and put them with West Turner under the control of a holding corporation named Pacific Petroleum Ltd.

Pacific Pete's opportunity came in 1947, shortly after Imperial Oil Ltd. had drilled the discovery well in the Leduc field of Alberta. McMahon was one of the first to rush into the field and try to share Imperial's new-found wealth by buying up and drilling adjacent properties. He discovered a farmer named John Rebus whose family had settled in Leduc before 1887 when the Alberta government began to retain mineral rights under all crown lands it sold or gave to newcomers. As owner of the oil rights under his land John Rebus was an exception among the Leduc farmers. Since his land was so near to Imperial Oil's he was also on the brink of riches.

But Rebus, a phlegmatic man in his middle thirties, at first wasn't interested. When McMahon approached him in the name of Canadian Atlantic Oil, a subsidiary of Pacific Pete, and tried to buy oil rights to a quarter section, Rebus, in the presence of his Scottish wife, said: "I don't want oil rigs here because I want to go on farming like my family's always done."

"But you'll be able to go on farming," said McMahon. "Once the wells are drilled there'll be nothing showing on the ground but a few pipes. There'll be no mess or danger. When we've finished you'll hardly know we've been here."

Rebus shook his head.

"I'll give you two hundred thousand dollars for the oil rights," said McMahon.

"Go away," said Rebus.

"I'll also give you," said McMahon, "twelve and a half percent of all the oil we get."

"You're crazy," said Rebus. "What do I want with oil?"

"I'll write you the cheque right now," said McMahon.

"Look, mister," said Rebus quietly, "the only thing this family needs right now is a new kitchen stove."

"I'll throw in a kitchen stove," said McMahon. Rebus grinned. McMahon grinned back. And Rebus said: "Okay, it's a deal."

One bleak day in March 1948 a plume of oil spurted up from a corner of the Rebus property and McMahon's drillers shouted exultantly. The gusher was named Atlantic No. 3. But it was no ordinary gusher. Released from aeons of tremendous pressure the rampant oil spewed over the surrounding landscape at the rate of twelve thousand barrels a day. Scores of laborers hired by McMahon threw dikes around the oil in an attempt to open it in a forty-McMahon's luck held when Atlantic No. 3 caught fire. Fire photos attracted investors.

McMahon's spending is legendary. When daughter Marion married in Calgary he flew guests from all over the continent, spent $20,000 on the party.

He's Father Bernard Brown, of Aklavik . . .

Sometime this month a handsome man in a caribou-skin parka will drive his Huskies along the winding Mackenzie delta channels into the town of Aklavik. Here, in a varnished room of the Catholic mission house, he will crank from a battered mimeograph machine five hundred copies of Canada's northernmost newspaper. Shortly afterward, 2,700 miles to the southeast, Canadian federal officials will read of their shortcomings in the pungent prose of Father Bernard Brown, an American.

Father Brown is an Oblate of Mary the Immaculate, a venturesome order of priests who devote their lives to the poor in the remote places of the world — the rain forests of Africa, the who's also an editor, hunter, artist and minstrel. See his own rare pictorial record on the next four pages ► jungles along the Amazon, the Sahara, the Bolivian mountains. There are 263 of these Oblate priests and 115 lay brothers scattered across the Canadian north in 205 missions. "Commandos of the Pope," they are called. "Specialists in difficult missions."

They came down the Mackenzie a hundred years ago, part missionaries, part explorers. They shot the rapids in frail canoes, tramped alone across the tundra, starved and were stranded, lived by their guns, slept in dugouts of snow, and munched on the heads of frozen fish in reeking native tents while they built their churches with their own hands.

All these things they do today, for the Arctic is little changed. A onetime art student, Father

Brown is at times a carpenter, hunter, fisherman, dog driver, dog breeder, architect, minstrel, mechanic, photographer, prospector and — his best-known role—writer, editor and publisher of the monthly Aklavik Journal, sold in trading posts up and down the delta.

Today Aklavik is really two towns — old and new — situated forty-five miles apart in the Mackenzie River delta; Father Brown divides his time between them. He lives in the new Aklavik and publishes his Journal in the old Aklavik and serves the natives scattered between the two towns as well. The original Aklavik sprawls on a bend of the Pokiak Channel, one of the many mouths of the Mackenzie. It's hemmed in by swamps and the river and has no more room to grow, so government workers are building a new Aklavik thirty miles to the east. But the wealth of the delta — an average of 220,000 muskrat skins a year — still pours into the clutter of frame houses, log cabins and shacks of the old Aklavik to make it the largest shopping centre in the Arctic and perhaps the world's greatest fur-trading post. The trappers who outfit there—Indians, Eskimos, métis, bearded English remittance men, Nordics married to natives, recluses and once even a Fiji Islander — make the old town a melting pot of races.

Seven hundred people live in old Aklavik. Two thirds of them are natives barely out of the Stone Age, and Father Brown opposes the government's efforts to bring continued on page 27

PHOTOGRAPHS BY FATHER BERNARD BROWN, OMI

The pictures on these and the following pages are equal in quality, technique and artistry to anything Maclean's has published by professional photographers, but they were made by a rank amateur. The cameraman is Father Bernard Brown, the Oblate missionary described by Alan Phillips on the previous page. They belong to a collection of more than five thousand color transparencies that the priest has built up during his years in the Canadian north. None of these photographs has ever been published before.

Most of these photographs were made north of the Arctic Circle in the area of Great Bear Lake, the lower Mackenzie River, Aklavik and the Arctic coast. Whether dealing with the human emotions of the people who make up his flock, or the arabesque designs of the land itself, Father Brown shows that he has not forgotten the art training he underwent before he entered the priesthood ten years ago in Buffalo.

Indian children at Hunter Bay have fun imitating their elders in a drum dance around the fire.

The priest photographed this wistful-looking child undergoing TB treatment at Port Radium.

Beauties of the north include natives like Doll Lennie, a half-Eskimo girl at Bear River Rapids.

The hard life of the north is etched in the face of this elderly Indian woman at Fort Franklin.

This maze of land and water, where the Mackenzie pushes through the last land barrier to the Arctic, like water through a sponge, is a part of Father Brown's parish.

This bleak action picture of a caribou hunt was taken by Father Brown at Great Bear Lake.

Movies

THE gigantic motion-picture industry was tottering a little, weakened by loss of blood as a result of beneficial surgery, as it entered 1957. But there was plenty of evidence indicating that the patient would survive and flourish, even if somewhat shrunken by amputations.

Throughout Canada and the United States neighborhood movie houses suffered in 1956 and a few more of them had to close their doors. Many of them, however, managed to keep right on attracting the customers in substantial numbers, especially with shrewdly balanced double bills more entertaining than the free shows on television. In the big first-run theatres there was an intensification of a pattern already visible in 1954 and 1955: the smasheroos did sensational business; the flops flopped more dismally than ever; "sure-fire" quickies quickly fizzled out.

While in Hollywood I learned that one of the largest studios didn't have a single production before the cameras on the home lots. There was talk—increasingly prevalent by the year's end—of economical mergers of studio facilities. Yet this same company had half a dozen important pictures being made on location, some in remote corners of the world. More and more screen stars were becoming independent producers themselves instead of staying under contract to individual studios as in the past. Thus much of the apparent inactivity in Hollywood was illusory: the town and the industry were changing, and some of the change would be painful, but nothing like the agonies of death.

As for TV, most of the studios that formerly fought it or ignored it are now milking it for revenue by selling or leasing to it their own top-quality oldies, and by making films for it. "If you can't lick 'em, join 'em" is still a cardinal slogan among the tycoons.

Gratifyingly, 1956 brought a leveling off in the Gimmick Race, the frenzied technological sweepstakes. CinemaScope, VistaVision, Todd-AO, Cinerama and "ordinary widescreen" appeared to have settled down to solvent coexistence. But a new trend arose to replace the Gimmick Race: movies that might not be better than ever but anyway longer than ever, running well over three hours instead of the former average of eighty or ninety minutes. Presumably this was intended to offer the ticket buyers super-duper whoppers beyond the reach of TV, but it didn't always work out to full specifications.

Cecil B. DeMille's mammoth new version of The Ten Commandments had dull patches in spite of the sublimity of its subject, and so did War and Peace and Giant for all their visual splendor. However, Mike Todd's flamboyant production of Around the World in 80 Days, which opened in New York in October but by mid-December still hadn't been seen in Canada, proved to be a really diverting chunk of frankly escapist entertainment. It was worth every minute of the three hours it takes to sit through.

No two critics — and no two customers either — ever come up with identical lists of the Best and Worst Movies of the Year. My own choices are as shown on these pages, including an unhesitating vote for Sir Laurence Olivier's production of Shakespeare's Richard III as 1956's foremost screen attraction. I believe it will be studied and enjoyed long after most of the year's celluloid output has been permanently retired to the dusty shelves.

Nominating The Spoilers as the year's "worst" was easier than usual. An utterly satanic villain and an utterly angelic hero grappled interminably for possession of an utterly unblemished heroine, while a noble intellectual dog joined in against the forces of evil. And the same story had been filmed four times before!

The checkered career of an Arctic priest continued from page 17

"Back in the bush the Indian is freer and nearer salvation than when he apes the white man"

them swiftly into the twentieth century.

His creed is on the masthead of his paper, a quotation from Friar Thomas Merton: "If you want to help others you have got to make up your mind to write some things that some men will condemn." When the journal of the Arctic Institute noted last fall that he "does not avoid controversy," Father Brown commented, chuckling, "I guess you might call that an understatement."

Reporting on a government plan to tear down old cabins and build new ones for the Indians at Fort Franklin on Great Bear Lake, he states his position: "We might . . . stop and ask just how much such improvements are going to help the Bear Lakers. These people base their economy on fur . . . Fur is caught away from the Fort. The more, therefore, we subsidize these people with relief, the more we prevent them from following their livelihood, the more we make them wards of the government. Better to give every man a tent and traps, board his kids in school so he can get away, and let him earn his own respectable independence than to build him a modern home and have him report every Friday for rations."

Father Brown and the government are each striving to influence the native Arctic people. Only a few years ago these people were thought to be dying out. Now, thanks to the government's interest in their health, they are on the increase. But the fur trade, meanwhile, is in a black depression. And even on the delta, the world's greatest natural-fur farm, where muskrats breed and are trapped by the hundreds of thousands, there are not enough trapping areas to go around. How will they live, these Indians and Eskimos now coming of age?

The government thinks they must learn other skills. Father Brown differs: "The government contends that the price of fur will not support the natives. I contend that it will, provided they get out and trap." Back in the bush, away from civilization, he thinks, these people are freer and nearer salvation than when they ape the white man.

Only one fact of the issue is clear-cut: in these Arctic everglades an alien culture out of the pagan past is being engulfed by mechanized Christendom. It can be seen in the radar compounds hidden among the spruce along the latitude of Aklavik, where Eskimo cat skimmers raised on frozen seal meat eat cornflakes for breakfast and strum cowboy songs on mail-order guitars. It can be seen on Aklavik's muddy streets, where a truck slews along with a grinning Eskimo youth at the wheel, a cigar in his mouth and a couple of lipsticked Eskimo girls beside him. And it can be seen in the new Aklavik where Indian carpenters fasten their jeans with beaded "Aklavik" belts made in Hong Kong. Father Brown is fighting a losing battle. He knows it. His fight is simply a protest at the passing of certain values.

But the priest has one advantage in the contest. From his base at the new townsite—East 3 it is called—he travels twelve to fifteen hundred miles each winter by dog team. He comes to know his people intimately. His sermons are based on this knowledge. For example, he tells of a lazy beaver named George. George spent all his time playing poker with the boys, playing a guitar, until it was too late. He was frozen in—like a lot of people who let things of the moment take their time and allow death to catch them without any good works.

At East 3 he often acts as the natives' go-between with the government. He receives a wire from an Indian in Fort McMurray, far upriver. The Indian, who is painting windowsills, wants "the Father" to get him a job driving a truck at the townsite. Father Brown knows that construction foreman Charlie Walrath needs truck drivers. He finds Charlie in his bunk, snatching an after-lunch snooze.

"Taking it easy, Charlie?"

"Ten hours is a long day, Father."

Father Brown mentions the man in McMurray.

Charlie says ambiguously, "I guess he better stay where he is."

"You can't use him?"

"No," Charlie says.

"You don't need truck drivers?" the priest persists.

Charlie sighs and sits up again. "Sure. We need truck drivers. But he's no good. I hear he was fired at McMurray."

"You don't want him then?"

Charlie does not and he thinks they are finally agreed upon it. "Well," he explains, "it's a lot of expense to bring him down, and then we'd have to mess around trying him out and he probably wouldn't work out anyway."

Father Brown seizes the opening. "Suppose, then, I tell him you can't guarantee him a job but if he comes up at his own expense you'll try him out."

"Oh, all right," Charlie says wryly. It is not a concession that he had intended to make.

Father Brown lights up a cigar and strolls down the new townsite road, a flamboyant figure in fringed buckskins, big as a football player. Smiling, he waves to a parishioner. "Héy, John! Drop into my office sometime. I've got a letter for you from your mother."

He meets another Indian. "Hi there, Joe. What's the matter?"

"My leg," Joe says. "It's swollen. Been swollen three days."

"Come over to my place and we'll have a look at it."

The priest's office and living quarters are in a small frame house on a centre-town site in East 3 where a Catholic school and mission will soon stand. It is sparsely furnished with folding chairs, mismatched tables, chintz curtains, a wolf-skin rug. On the board walls hang snowshoes, the gift of an Indian chief; two white fox pelts and a caribou-skin grub bag—also gifts; a crucifix, a guitar and several paintings—his own work.

Joe's leg is infected. The priest gives him penicillin. "Go home and lie down," he tells Joe. "I'll look in on you tomorrow." Through the window he spots a passerby and beckons him in. "Where you off to, Peter?"

"Aklavik," says Peter reluctantly, referring to the old town.

"You know old lady Pascal? She made this fur jacket. Pretty good job, eh? Lots of beadwork. Will you see if you can get fifty dollars for it in Aklavik? She needs the money." Peter nods his head resignedly.

A buxom young Indian matron enters, pushing one child ahead of her while another clings to her dress. "Hello, Margaret," Father Brown says.

"You got something for sores, Father?"

The priest examines the boy's face. "Right around his eye, eh? Sure, Margaret. I've got some good stuff. A doctor in New York sent it to me." He ladles out some salve. "Just like ice cream," he jokes. "Don't let the boys eat it. Better cover it when he goes to bed so it won't get on the blankets. Emily still sewing, Margaret?"

"No. Picking blueberries."

"So? Good money there." He hands her the jar. "Now don't forget, if it gets any worse let me know."

All week long in a steady stream visitors arrive. They come for help with a balky motor, for tea, a chat, advice, to show off on the guitar or to ask him to carry a message upriver, for once a month Father Brown points his Huskies up the ice-rimmed east channel and heads for old Aklavik, stopping along the way to add to his huge collection of color photographs.

Five hours upriver he pulls into Big Rock, the centuries-old fishing camp of the Loucheux. "Niendjit Takocho? (How's it going?)" he calls to the smiling Indians who crowd around him speechlessly, giving him their customary single limp shake. The boys unharness and feed his dogs. The girls pack his bedroll into the largest cabin.

The priest, acting as volunteer postman, hands out letters, family-allowance cheques, a parcel for which he cannot collect, then sits down to a plate of smoking moosemeat. He hears confessions, questions the children on church doctrine, tells Chief Hyacinthe to inform everyone of mass at eight in the morning, leads in prayer, then crawls in his sleeping bag, tired but relaxed. Two days later he waves good-bye—and heads northwest for old Aklavik, stopping overnight with a trapper or two en route.

Reaching the old town, Father Brown reports to Father Max Ruyant, his superior, a salty veteran of many Arctic adventures. He checks into a room in the rectory, calls on some forty persons in the mission-run hospital, says hello to the nurses, the Grey Nuns who also teach in the mission school, and visits along the boardwalk that links the neatly fenced compounds of the Hudson's Bay Company, the Signal Corps, the RCMP, the government, and the Anglican mission at the other end of town.

Here he gathers the month's news: arrivals, departures, an Indian trapper is destitute, high-paying jobs can be had on the Dewline, wolves have driven the caribou north, a party was held at the Legion. Back in the rectory he sorts his mail: stories of plane crashes, storms, fires, polar bears, snow conditions, the unique walled-in life of the north. Then, unshathing his portable typewriter, the priest lashes out at the government for mismanaging the reindeer herd that supplies Aklavik with fresh meat. "Could it be," he suggests, "that the government is fostering a pessimistic report on caribou in order to foster legislation to prevent the people of the country from killing the animals?"

"We note with regret," he wrote in the fall of 1955, "the unfortunate state of affairs brought on by the opening of the liquor store in Aklavik. It was stated at first that the incidence of drunkenness would taper off after the novelty had worn off. This tapering-off process has been far too slow to suit the majority of conscientious townfolk, especially those charged with the spiritual care of the people. Too many are buying spirits with money needed to feed and clothe a family. Some liquor permits were actually issued to those classed as 'destitute.'"

On the system of granting permits he wrote: "A white man may have a permit, but a native may not. But if an Eskimo works as a white man for eighteen months (for example, as a cat skinner) he may apply for a permit. This gives rise to the creepy situation where if you drive a D-8 you can drink but if you drive dogs you can't!"

The priest types his stories and etches his cartoons directly onto a stencil. It takes him three days to complete his monthly issue, each one a continuation of the feud with Ottawa that has made him, in only a year and a half, one of the Arctic's most controversial characters.

Father Brown always felt that he would get to the Arctic someday. He grew up in a cliffside cottage facing north across Lake Ontario in wooded country nine miles from Rochester, N.Y. His devout mother named her sons Bernard, Justin and Thomas, after the three great Catholic theologians. His father, sales manager for a jewelry firm, took them on camping trips to Canada.

Instead of a paper route Bernard had a trapline. With Justin he took canoe trips through Ontario. They were once lost for two days in a tamarack swamp far up the Gattineau River, and were saved when their signal fire was seen by a passing logger from his boat. A happy-go-lucky boy who liked football, boxing and skiing, he also worked at sketching and painting. And though far from studious, he read every book in the public library on the Arctic.

On graduation from high school he hitchhiked west, bound for Alaska. He drove a bus in Kansas, worked at Cheyenne's rodeo, chauffeured a millionairess, and arrived at Seattle to find all the ships tied up by a longshoremen's strike. "That was the turning point for me," he says. He rode the rods east and entered the Oblate college in Buffalo, for he knew that the Oblates were in the north. Summers, he enrolled in a civil training course for pilots and picked up his license.

After two years in college, where he toiled at Hebrew and Greek for a better appreciation of scripture, he spent a year on probation studying only the rules of the order. Then he took the Oblate vows: poverty, chastity and obedience, and plunged into philosophy (two years) and theology (four). As labor boss of one group of boys, he learned to plough, use tools, handle horses, drive a tractor and butcher pigs.

In 1948, at twenty-seven, Bernard Brown was ordained a priest. Of the seven boys who had started college with him only he had survived the rigorous course. That summer, to his great joy, he was sent to Bishop Trocellier's Mackenzie Vicariate at Fort Norman on the Mackenzie, about four hundred miles below Aklavik.

His first long dog patrol was nearly disastrous. He was following a well marked trail to Fort Franklin on Great Bear Lake. "I did everything wrong," he says ruefully. His lead dog, following too closely, would step on his snowshoes and trip him. He unharnessed a lagging dog which dropped behind and was eaten by wolves. He camped in a ravine where his fire sank in the deep snow. He tethered his dogs too close and they stole his food. The lead dog bit the trace in two and loosed four dogs. "I had a terrible time in the dark trying to catch them and tie them together." Then a snowstorm blotted out the trail. He was found next day by Indians and guided to Franklin.

By next summer he was preaching in the Slavey Indian dialect. "Learning a native language," he says, "is harder than building a mission." Over the next five years he built three missions. At Fort Franklin he helped the Indians skid foundation logs out of the bush and ran lumber shipped from outside down the boiling rapids of Great Bear River in a twenty-foot power canoe. At Camself Portage, on Lake Athabaska, he persuaded Johnny Nesbitt, a bush pilot who struck it rich in uranium, to fly Eldorado company carpenters into Camself on week ends. And at nearby Uranium City he replaced a burned-down church with a mission of his own design.

Much of these five years was spent in Indian camps. "It doesn't take long," he says, "to get used to little things that seem obnoxious at first. Like the smell of fish heads cooking, and eating rabbits' eyes. But that's the best part of the fish and animal. We've got a lot to learn from the natives. In any community of whites, for example, you have cliques, fights, backbiting. That's something you seldom see among the natives. Some people have the idea that we try to change their views. We only try to change what conflicts with the salvation of their souls. You take that bunch at Franklin. They live with hardship and death. They make just enough money to make ends meet. We show them that here's an incentive for being good. It puts a different face on their hardships."

At Franklin the Indians would wake the priest at night for advice on a breech birth. They'd squat beside him, holding a lighted match in front of his eyes until his departed spirit returned. He sewed up their knife wounds, treated their skin infections with sulphur ointments, rubbed their heads with larkspur lotion to rid them of lice, used coramine to stop the convulsions of a boy scalded with boiling tea. But five times one winter his penicillin failed to halt meningitis, pneumonia and strep throat; he stood by, helplessly, while one seven-year-old boy died.

At Camsell Portage in 1953, Father Brown also turned prospector. The pre-Cambrian north shore of Lake Athabasca was at that time the hottest uranium-bearing rock in the world. After poring over aerial photos the priest staked claims that brought him an offer of one hundred thousand dollars in cash. But the sale was blocked by a legal entanglement. In the end he found breeding dogs more profitable.

Around Lake Athabasca, he says, "you'll see natives who have eight or nine scrawny dogs. They could get the same work out of six good dogs and cut feeding costs by a third." At nearby Fond du Lac, Father Charles Gamache was endeavoring to breed a swifter stronger sled dog by crossing greyhounds with St. Bernards, but the short-furred animals nearly froze to death. "My idea," says Father Brown, "was to try to improve the strain with Eskimo Huskies and purebred Samoyeds. The Samoyed from Russia is the grandparent of all sled dogs, the most ancient dog known to man. It's this breed, crossbred with wolves, that produced all the dogs we know as Malamutes, or Siberian Huskies. They're smart, well furred and have terrific stamina." But the Samoyed's legs were too short for the deep snow of the bush country. Father Brown bred a tougher, curly-tailed, pointed-eared animal. They were in demand as far away as Yellowknife when his bishop posted him to Aklavik, in 1955.

At Aklavik he saw the native in transition and much of what he saw he did not like. "Anyone can foresee it's a changing economy," he says, "but the government acts as if the bottom had dropped from the fur market. When I was in Tuk-tuk an Eskimo boy asked me if I'd take his fur out and ship it to the Edmonton fur auction. He had 153 white fox. Right now he'd get an average of sixteen dollars a pelt. He can live like a king on that. And this wasn't even a big year for fox. The only white trapper at Fort Providence on Great Slave Lake, Sandy Davidson, is making a thousand to fifteen hundred a year. That's enough to live on, Sandy says."

The Aklavik Journal, which Father Brown began when he arrived at Aklavik, jibes at the government's efforts to teach young natives a trade by sending them outside for courses in truck driving, welding, mechanics. "Fellows like (Northern Affairs Minister) Lesage," he says, "come up and give us a big harangue. Roads will be built. Industries will come in. That doesn't mean the natives will be absorbed into it. North of Yellowknife there's a mine employing one native out of a possible thirty or forty. A lot have been tried out; they just haven't stuck it. They're not much good for the day-in, day-out, eight-hour shift. An Indian or an Eskimo doesn't want to be regimented. He doesn't want to punch a clock. The government's too optimistic. They think they're going to pull everyone out of the bush right away. They can't do it. It's going to take time and education."

True, say officials in Northern Affairs, but the natives' plight calls for action now. They do not seem angry at Father Brown. "He's a gadfly, yes," says Frank Cunningham, director of the administration branch, "but he gets people thinking about these problems. Eight out of ten, having thought them over, will say Brown's wrong. We'd rather have criticism than be ignored. I look forward to every issue (of the Journal). In fact, I'm a little disappointed if he doesn't take a crack at 'Cunningham and Company.'"

The government has not been Father Brown's only victim. He raps Canadian Pacific for high air-freight rates, carps at Hudson's Bay Company prices. Annoyed, Hudson's Bay manager Herb Figgures last spring withdrew the $2.50 ad he had been paying from his own pocket. Father Brown ran the incident as news: "Biggest trader in Aklavik, the Hudson's Bay Co., have withdrawn their ad from the Journal on the plea that it is too big a drain on their advertising allotment!"

When the Canadian Legion followed suit because of his anti-government stand, the priest tossed out all ads and raised his price to twenty-five cents. "I don't have to cater to advertisers," he says. "This isn't a money-making scheme. I began this paper to give the native people a voice, to keep them informed, to present their side, and try to influence the government. The people I want to reach most can afford to pay twenty-five cents."

His attitude causes Aklavik's more outspoken citizens to describe him as "puffed up," "bumptious" and "bossy." The more charitable explain him simply as "an American." But everyone admits that Father Brown gets things done.

Last July, with two hundred workers swarming over the new townsite, the priest put a newly built cabin aboard the mission barge and became Aklavik's first resident to move. "Missionaries today," he explains, "must expect to do more traveling. Now we have to go to people where they used to come to us. When we first came into this country the people were new Christians and had fervor. Now you've got a bunch of whites of different religions who don't attend the church.

The natives are great for aping whites and they follow their example. Whereas before when we rang the bell everyone flocked around, now they'll have their radios tuned in to Del Rio, Texas, listening to singing commercials and cowboy music—they're wild for cowboys, they've all bought guitars. We figure the missionary comes before the doctor. First things first. It's more important to get into Heaven than to be cured of TB, and unless they come to church they're not instructed."

The problem today, he points out, is not to convert the natives but to get them to live by the Ten Commandments. This is why he says flatly, "We don't want them in the forts. It creates all kinds of moral problems. They gamble, they make home-brew, sometimes they fight when they're drunk, though seldom when they're sober. There's all the difference between night and day to see a native family in town and to see that same family in a tent in the bush where the spruce flooring is renewed every week. They're cleaner, happier, better in every way."

He tells the story of Chief Colin Campbell, who bought two drums of naphtha gas, enough lamp fuel to last all winter. But so many people came to his cabin to borrow a canful that he finally put the drums outside and let them help themselves. When Father Brown next visited him he was sitting by candlelight.

"They're a really generous people," Father Brown says. "They live the ideal of the early Christians. They share in the village and they share along the trail. You don't have to preach to them on The Good Samaritan. In this country the first one past would have helped him. But now the government's teaching them to provide for tomorrow. A few are sending out and having grub shipped in, saving a third. To keep that grub, they have to refuse to share it. We teach them to get ahead, the dog-eat-dog business, and the fellow who tries to be ambitious, to save and hoard, loses friends and becomes an outcast. Eventually, of course, we'll create castes."

Father Brown offers no solution to this dilemma, for the native who knows an easier life seldom wants to return to the bush, and the bush can no longer support his increasing numbers. This is more than the government's opinion: it is that of white and native trapper alike, at least on the delta, where the caribou come and go with restless illogic and where, with their going, trappers are forced to buy store food at prices that would stagger a southern suburbanite. Father Brown is an Arctic Don Quixote, tilting his lance at an inexorable future.

But he is happily living the life he has always wanted. "You get down to a basic existence here," he says, "you kill your game. You drive your dogs back loaded with meat. Boy, you're hungry. You eat a lot. Then you roll back on your sleeping bag on spruce boughs and light up a cigarette. Boy, that's something. You can't duplicate that in civilization." ★

Mr. Benturian and the beautiful palimpsest continued from page 11

"I have a marvelous idea," said Mlle. Séraphique. "I'll meet you in the eighteenth century" satisfaction like the acquisition of knowledge. After all, what are material possessions? When you have seen the view from Fiesole, or learned how to say ice water in Italian, you have something that will stay with you for the rest of your life."

But Mlle. Séraphique went on brooding under her hat, chewing pensively on an olive.

"Besides," said Mr. Benturian. "Florence is a well-known centre of fashion. Florentine couturiers are said to be excellent. Don't forget, Schiaparelli herself was once an Italian."

Whether or not he had any reason for making this particular remark, it was a shrewd one. Mlle. Séraphique went on eating her olive, but a distant and contemplative look came into her eyes, as though a set of tiny gears and sprockets had started to mesh inside her mind.

"Florence has something for everyone," said Mr. Benturian, who had not noticed this. "It is like a beautiful palimpsest."

"A what?"

"A palimpsest," he explained patiently, "is a medieval parchment that has been painted over several times by the monks, so it can be written on again."

"How thrifty," said Mlle. Séraphique.

"Likewise," said Mr. Benturian. "Florence is a beautiful palimpsest upon which each century has written its distinctive message. Or," he added, "if you are not impressed with the metaphor of the palimpsest, think of it as a mille-feuille pastry, which is also composed of layers."

"I think I will have an éclair for dessert," said Mlle. Séraphique.

"I have been thinking," said Mr. Benturian, "that we might spend the afternoon going to the art galleries. The Uffizi and the Pitti Palace, for example. One cannot leave Florence without paying homage to the Renaissance. It is all part of one's education."

Mlle. Séraphique took another olive.

"Afterward," he went on, "we might shop around for some small but perfect souvenir to take back with us as a reminder of our stay."

"You may be right," said Mlle. Séraphique. "As a matter of fact, I do need a basic black dress, something simple but expensive-looking, with the new waistline."

"That is not exactly what I had in mind," said Mr. Benturian. "I was thinking of something of more lasting value—a painting, for example. Not too large, of course; something suitable for a small apartment, but of the finest quality. It will be expensive, but after all it is an investment."

"Bibi," said Mlle. Séraphique, sitting up, "I have a perfectly marvelous idea. You want to go to museums and I want to look at clothes. But are these two desires incompatible? Why should we make each other miserable? After all we are not Siamese twins. Why don't you go off to your museums, and meanwhile I'll shop around for a good basic black dress?"

"But my dear," said Mr. Benturian,

"what about the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, and the seventeenth century? This way you are only skimming over the top layer of the palimpsest."

"Let us be systematic," said Mlle. Séraphique. "I'll begin with the fashions of today and you begin with the Renaissance, and I'll meet you somewhere in the middle of the eighteenth century."

Her logic was unshakable; after all she was French.

"Bibi," she said as she pulled on her gloves. "I will positively have to have some of those fantastic Italian banknotes. The big ones, not the little ones. In Milan you gave me a lot of the little ones, and they didn't last five minutes."

Mr. Benturian went to the Uffizi, and then to the Pitti and the National Museum. He consulted his catalogue frequently, and from time to time he made notes in a small pocket notebook. After a while he folded up the notebook, put it back in his pocket, and went out on the street and hailed a taxi. "Dove volete?" said the driver.

Mr. Benturian took a business card out of his wallet and consulted it. "43, via Calzaiofi," he said.

The taxi stopped in a crowded street in front of a shop with a large gilded sign reading "Enrico Ladrino, Art Dealer and Antiquarian." "This is it," said Mr. Benturian.

Signor Ladrino was standing behind the counter, a small bald man with the face of a cheerful and intelligent pygmy.

"I am interested," said Mr. Benturian, "in buying a small painting to take back with me to Paris, something suitable for an apartment of limited size, but of the finest quality."

"At your service," said Signor Ladrino, rubbing his hands.

"Do you have any Caravaggios?"

"Dozens."

"Raphaels?"

"A few, although Raphaels tend to run larger than Caravaggios. Scusa, what is the color scheme of your apartment?"

"Olive, with white woodwork," said Mr. Benturian.

"Perhaps a small Greco would be nice."

"But Greco was a Spanish painter!"

"It doesn't matter," said Signor Ladrino. "We can supply anything."

"Very well, I would like to look at some small Caravaggios, about this size," said Mr. Benturian, holding his hands about two feet apart.

"Scusa," said Signor Ladrino.

He went into the back room, there was a noise of scraping and bumping, voices were heard arguing in voluble Italian, and after a while Signor Ladrino came out with a pile of five or six paintings. "How about a nice Crucifixion, ninety centimeters by seventy-four centimeters?" he said.

"Nothing religious," said Mr. Benturian. "It makes my wife nervous. Haven't you something suggesting conjugal love, in a blue or a green?"

"Lady with Mandolin perhaps—ninety-eight centimeters by eighty centimeters?"

"Too chaste," said Mr. Benturian.

"I know just what you want," said Signor Ladrino, triumphantly pulling a painting out of the bottom of the pile. "Love Chastised, seventy-six centimeters by fifty-nine centimeters!"

"It's a little smaller than I thought," said Mr. Benturian. "How much is it?"

"One million two hundred thousand lire," said Signor Ladrino without turning a hair.

"I'm afraid I get confused when the numbers get over a million," said Mr. Benturian. "How much is that in dollars?"

"Two thousand two hundred," said Signor Ladrino rapidly, "and then, of course, there is six hundred dollars for the frame."

"I'm not sure I care for the frame," said Mr. Benturian.

"Scusa," said Signor Ladrino politely, laying down the painting. "You are an American?"

"By citizenship," said Mr. Benturian. "By descent I am an Armenian."

The distinction was wasted on Signor Ladrino. "I am surprised at you," he said. "Everyone knows that the Americans are the most generous people in the world. In America everyone drives a motorcar and smokes thousand-lire cigars. What is six hundred dollars to an American? Nothing. Americans have gold bathtubs and drink champagne every night for dinner. In Italy all the little children are hungry and have to go to bed without any supper. I have two nephews, three nieces, and four grandchildren in Calabria who have never had a square meal in their lives. And what do you Americans send them? Tractors! I ask you in the name of God, can a little child eat a tractor? If your little child was starving, would you give it a tractor?"

"Actually I am an Armenian by extraction," said Mr. Benturian. "Armenians are very kind to children."

"And so," continued Signor Ladrino, "you Americans come here like princes with your motorcar, with your cigar, with your fountain pen, with the diamond on your finger and the gold tooth in your mouth, and what do you do? You refuse to pay a mere six hundred dollars for a frame! But," he added, "to please you, I'll make it five hundred."

Mr. Benturian got out his chequebook.

"By the way," he asked as Signor Ladrino wrapped up the painting in newspapers, "can you recommend to me the name of a good artist?"

"What do you want him for?" said Signor Ladrino laying his finger thoughtfully alongside his nose.

"I want to have my portrait painted to surprise my wife," said Mr. Benturian.

"In what style?"

"I don't know yet," said Mr. Benturian. "I would like a versatile painter, one who can paint in any style."

"I understand perfectly," said Signor Ladrino. "I know just the artist for you." He pulled a small printed card out of a drawer and handed it to Mr. Benturian.

"Maestro Carlo Senzapantalone, Versatile Painter," Mr. Benturian read. "But his address is the same as yours!"

"We allow him to work in the back room," said Signor Ladrino, taking the card back. "He is absolutely honest, and can paint in any style. In short, a genius."

"I'll come back later this afternoon," said Mr. Benturian.

WHEN he got back to Baldini's Mlle. Seraphique was already waiting for him, with three packages in her left arm and two in her right arm and one hanging from a string on her elbow.

"I bought a Caravaggio," he told her.

"I bought a basic black dress, a gold lamé evening gown in the new length, two hats and three pairs of shoes," she said. "Bibi, you were right. Florence is a very nice place. What was it you said you bought?"

"A Caravaggio," he said. "A small one, but of the very finest quality. It will look very nice in our apartment."

"I have news for you," said Mlle Seraphique. "I found out this afternoon that there is an Italian law against exporting national treasures out of the country."

"Well?" said Mr. Benturian.

"Well," said Mlle. Seraphique. "Renaissance paintings, according to the law I just mentioned, are classified as national treasures. So, although you undoubtedly own the painting, you will not be allowed to take it out of the country."

"How interesting," said Mr. Benturian. "However, I believe there is no restriction on the exportation of modern painting?"

"Not that I know of," said Mlle. Seraphique.

"Aha," said Mr. Benturian.

They got into a taxi and drove off, and Mr. Benturian settled back with an air of mysterious satisfaction. "Bibi," said Mlle. Seraphique suspiciously, "I swear you are thinking of something."

In ten minutes they were standing in the presence of Maestro Carlo Senzapantalone, the Versatile Painter.

"I believe you paint pictures to order?" said Mr. Benturian.

"Absolutely," said Senzapantalone. He smiled winningly, as much, it appeared, to Mlle. Seraphique as to Mr. Benturian.

"Does he speak French?" said Mlle. Seraphique.

"No," said Mr. Benturian.

"If a dex beaux yeux," said Mlle. Séraphique.

Mr. Benturian was unwrapping his package. "What do you think of this Caravaggio?" he asked.

"A beautiful piece of work," said Senzapantalone, looking at it appreciatively.

"Very well," said Mr. Benturian. "I want you to paint another painting on top of it."

"I understand you perfectly," said Senzapantalone. "What style of painting do you prefer?"

"What are the possibilities?" said Mr. Benturian.

"To begin with," said Senzapantalone, "we have the mediaeval or Gothic, then pre-Renaissance, Renaissance or quattrocento, late Renaissance or Seicento, then baroque, neoclassic, pre-romantic, romantic, late romantic, pastoral-romantic, classical-romantic, sociological-naturalistic, impressionistic, expressionistic, symbolistic, surrealist and cubist."

"What's he saying?" said Mlle. Séraphique.

"My dear," said Mr. Benturian, "you should learn Italian. It is a beautiful language."

"I also do montages, collages, and mobiles to order," said Senzapantalone.

"What would you charge for a painting this size?" said Mr. Benturian.

"That depends."

"On what?"

"On the style, for one thing."

"Which style is the cheapest?"

"To begin with, the mediaeval is the most expensive. It is very difficult; I have to make the cracks in the paint. From the mediaeval to the modern period the prices go down steadily, ending with cubism, the cheapest of all."

"Personally I detest cubism," said Mr. Benturian.

"I agree with you," said Senzapantalone. "Has it ever occurred to you that the degeneracy of modern painting is due to the influence of distilled liquors?"

"I have never heard the theory," said Mr. Benturian, "but it sounds like a plausible one."

"If you are not too busy I will explain it to you," said Senzapantalone. "As everyone knows, during the Renaissance the artists drank nothing but wine. As a result they saw clearly, and their paintings had line, form, color, balance, symmetry and perspective. Then came the industrial revolution and the invention of distilled liquors, especially absinthe. As you know, all the modern artists in France are addicted to absinthe. As a result there occurs a degeneration of the central nervous system, the eyesight is affected, and their paintings become distorted, unbalanced, warped and impossible to understand."

"What's he saying?" demanded Mlle. Séraphique impatiently.

"He says all modern artists drink absinthe," said Mr. Benturian. "I believe you," he said to Senzapantalone in French, since he was getting a little confused by this bilingual conversation in which neither of the languages was his own. "Scusa, devo parlare italiano. I say, I believe you. I detest cubism personally. Still, in this case the style is not important. The main thing is to cover up this Caravaggio as cheaply as possible. I'll take cubism, since it seems to be the least expensive."

"I understand you perfectly," said Senzapantalone. "However, there are several different kinds of cubism: cubism, proper, cubo-modernism, crypto-cubism, and cubo-surrealism. The prices are all the same."

"Which can you get done the quickest?" said Mr. Benturian.

"Cubo-modernism, crypto-cubism or cubo-surrealism would take three days."

If you want cubism proper I can have it for you tomorrow. I use a straightedge, and this speeds up the process greatly."

"Very well, cubism," said Mr. Benturian.

"Fine," said Senzapantalone. "A nice cubist landscape. Two hundred and forty thousand lire, plus the cost of materials."

"What's he saying?" said Mlle. Séraphique.

"He is talking about art," said Mr. Benturian. "My dear, you really should learn Italian. It is a beautiful language, especially the numbers."

THE Benturians left Florence shortly after noon the next day. Mr. Benturian called for the painting at eleven. It was packed carefully into the Mercedes along with Mlle. Séraphique, the maid, the secretary, a number of packages and hatboxes, and a great many pieces of luggage; the doors were shut with great difficulty by a crowd of small boys and policemen, and they drove away leaving a cloud of fifty-lire notes blowing along the pavement. At the border all went smoothly. It was not felt necessary to open the luggage. The Italian inspector looked at Mr. Benturian's painting and merely shrugged slightly, as though he had his opinions on the matter but preferred to maintain a tactful silence. Finally everything was packed back into the car. Mr. Benturian shook hands all around, and the Mercedes whisked away, leaving the inspector smoking a cigar and thoughtfully folding and unfolding a ten-thousand-lire note in his hands.

That night they stopped in Nice, the next night in Lyons, and the third night they were home in their apartment on the Boulevard Raspail.

"Now you have your Caravaggio," said Mlle. Séraphique with faint derision, "but no one can see it, since it is completely hidden under that insufferable jigsaw puzzle."

"Still," said Mr. Benturian, "there is some satisfaction in knowing that one owns a Caravaggio."

"Bibi," said Mlle. Séraphique, "I swear you are thinking of something. I can always tell; you go around pulling your mustache in that clever manner. Anyhow, the whole thing is a terrible waste of money. There are other things it might have been spent for. As you know very well, I need a new handbag, or perhaps several new handbags."

"What about all the nice clothes you bought in Florence?" said Mr. Benturian.

"Did I buy a handbag?"

"No, but..."

"Very well."

"But..."

"I don't see why you insist on asking questions about things you don't understand. And don't tell me you can't afford it. I suppose you would not deny that, if you liquidated all your assets whatsoever and converted them into cash, you would have enough money to buy me a small handbag?"

"No, but..."

"No, but you prefer to keep me here, confined in this cubicle of an apartment like a wretched Turkish odalisque, knowing very well that I cannot leave the apartment without a new handbag, which you have already admitted you can very well afford."

Mr. Benturian realized that essentially Mlle. Séraphique was casting aspersions on his generosity, and he rallied bravely to defend himself. "My dear..." he began.

"Will you or won't you?" she cried.

"My dear..."

"You are nothing but a parsimonious old trout," she shouted, stamping her foot, "and I am going to move into the maid's room."

There was a short silence, after which Mr. Benturian began over again. "My dear," he told her, "I would gladly buy you any number of handbags if I thought it would make you happy. I am interested only in your welfare. It is not wise to rush off in all directions buying handbags until we decide exactly what it is best to do. Let us kiss and make up, and have a quiet dinner at home. Tomorrow we can decide about the handbag."

"Dinner at home again!" declaimed Mlle. Séraphique hysterically. "We never go out anywhere. It is bad enough to marry an American millionaire in the first place, but to be subsequently deprived of the fruits of one's ignominious bargain is intolerable!"

"Very well," conceded Mr. Benturian. "We'll go out to dinner. It is now four o'clock. I have an appointment at five with a man on the Quai Malaquais, and when I come back we will get dressed and go off to dinner at the Tour d'Argent."

Mlle. Séraphique was somewhat mollified at this, although she complained that she would not cut a very smart figure if she had to carry her lipstick and compact with her in a paper bag.

"My dear," said Mr. Benturian, "do not concern yourself about it. Everything will be taken care of."

ON the second floor of an eighteenth-century hotel on the Quai Malaquais, not far from the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, was the studio of M. Emile Charterin, Expert Art Restorer and Renovator. M. Charterin had been recommended to Mr. Benturian by a friend of his who was a professor in the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, and who had assured him that M. Charterin was frequently called in by the Louvre for its most delicate jobs of restoration. It was M. Charterin, according to the professor, who had recently astonished the art world by detecting and removing the clothes that a narrow-minded monk of the eighteenth century had added to a superb nude of Botticelli. M. Charterin's very appearance, in fact, inspired confidence; he was tall and thin, with the cold eye of a true scientist. He scarcely nodded when Mr. Benturian came in with his painting under his arm.

"What do you think of this?" Mr. Benturian asked him, removing the wrappings.

"M'mm," said M. Charterin.

"I agree," said Mr. Benturian. "Personally I detest cubism. However, there is more than meets the eye. You can restore paintings to their original condition?"

"Sometimes," said M. Charterin.

"Very well," said Mr. Benturian. "I would like you to restore this painting to its original condition. Cost is no object. Are you sure you can do it without harm to the original?"

"I will do my best," said M. Charterin. "but in the restoration of paintings each case is unique, and the results are always uncertain. Will you sign the authorization, please?"

"When will it be finished?" asked Mr. Benturian.

"I can't hurry my work," said M. Charterin. "I am a craftsman. If you are in a hurry, please take it to a planing mill."

"Not at all," said Mr. Benturian. "I wouldn't dream of hurrying you. Please take all the time you need to do a careful job."

"Come back in three weeks," said M. Charterin.

On the way home Mr. Benturian stopped in at a shop on the Boulevard Montparnasse and bought an Algerian leather handbag with a chamois lining and a gold clasp. "It is true that Algerian leather costs a little more," said the saleslady, "but it is very chic. Monsieur has only to look in the fashion magazines."

"I believe you," said Mr. Benturian.

DURING the next three weeks Mr. Benturian went about looking like a cat who knows where there is a canary he can go and swallow whenever he wants to. Mlle. Séraphique grew more and more annoyed, although she showed no sign. "Why do you keep pulling your mustache like that?" she demanded.

"It makes it grow," he said.

Three weeks later to the day, at nine o'clock in the morning, Mr. Benturian presented himself at M. Charterin's, smoking a cigar and as calm as a judge. "Is the painting finished?" he asked.

"Yes," said M. Charterin.

"I hope everything went well?"

"Quite well."

"You had no difficulty in removing the paint?"

"The cubist landscape came off with no trouble at all," said M. Charterin.

"The paint was still soft. The imitation Caravaggio and the portrait of Mussolini were more difficult."

"I beg your pardon?" said Mr. Benturian.

"I then removed the panorama of the battle of Austerlitz," continued M. Charterin imperturbably, "and the pastoral scene in the manner of Gustave Courbet. Next, a romantic idyll after Watteau, two Vermeers, and a Giotto. The last three were the most difficult; some of the paint had been on there for twenty years."

Mr. Benturian was silent for a long time. Then he shrugged, pulled the lobe of his ear, and produced his chequebook from his coat pocket. "I see," he said philosophically. "You have done a splendid job. I am impressed. What is your fee?"

"My usual price for removing a painting from a canvas is seventy thousand francs," said M. Charterin. "In this case I was obliged to remove nine layers in all. Nine times seventy thousand comes to six hundred and thirty thousand francs, plus the usual five thousand francs for cleaning the frame."

"That sounds reasonable," said Mr. Benturian. "How much is that in dollars?"

"Exactly one thousand eight hundred and fourteen dollars and twenty-eight cents," said M. Charterin, figuring on a slip of paper.

Mr. Benturian made out the cheque in a round Spencerian hand, laid it on the counter, and picked up his hat and gloves. "I have only one more question, dear M. Charterin," he said, "and then I will take no more of your time."

"Yes?"

"When you removed the nine layers of paint that you have described, what did you find at the bottom?"

"A cubist still life, in the manner of Braque," said M. Charterin. "Not badly done, if you like that sort of thing."

"Personally I detest cubism," said Mr. Benturian.

"It is all a matter of taste," said M.

Charterin. "Would you like to see it?" He led Mr. Benturian into the studio and unveiled the painting on an easel.

"Always pineapples and guitars," said Mr. Benturian sadly. "So very monotonous. By Jove, you know, it is in the school of Braque. It says right there at the bottom, Georges Braque."

"I beg your pardon?"

"I say, it says right there at the bottom, Georges Braque."

M. Charterin put on his steel-rimmed glasses and peered with a certain hostile scepticism at the signature. "Nom d'un nom," he muttered. "I was so busy examining the painting with a magnifying glass that I never took time to look at it. Now what can this mean?"

"A flagrant forgery, no doubt," said Mr. Benturian.

"Un moment, un petit moment," said M. Charterin.

He pulled several tattered catalogues down from his shelf and examined them. Then he screwed a little eyeglass, such as jewelers use to examine fine watches, into his eye and scrutinized the painting from a range of half a centimeter.

"It is," he sighed, removing the little eyeglass, "indubitably and absolutely a Braque. Nature morte avec musique, painted in 1911, missing since 1934, when it was bought by an Iraqi collector and shipped to Baghdad. How I failed to recognize it I cannot imagine. I pray you, Mr. Benturian, do not tell anyone about this incident, or I will be an object of merriment throughout the entire art world."

"I will be the soul of discretion," promised Mr. Benturian. "The painting is valuable?"

"Only last week," said M. Charterin. "I had a visitor, an American, an inhabitant of the Province of Texas, who begged me to find him a small Braque for which he offered to pay thirty-five thousand dollars."

"He shall have it for that price," said Mr. Benturian generously. "Plus six hundred and thirty thousand francs for removing old paint, and, of course, five thousand francs for cleaning the frame."

ON HIS way home Mr. Benturian stopped at an art store in the Boulevard Saint-Michel, where he bought a reproduction of Caravaggio's Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian and a box of thumbtacks for two thousand francs. When he got home he pinned the print up on the wall and contemplated it with some satisfaction.

"It makes me nervous," said Mlle.

Séraphique. "Where is your real Caravaggio?"

"It turned out to be spurious," said Mr. Benturian. "So I sold it to an inhabitant of the Province of Texas."

"I gave my lame gown to the maid," said Mlle. Séraphique. "It was too small around the hips."

"After all," said Mr. Benturian, "what are material possessions? We still have each other, and life holds many good things. Let us go down to the Quai Voltaire and have dinner at Laperouse."

"Don't be ironic," said Mlle. Séraphique. "What do you expect me to carry for a handbag? Algerian leather has been out of fashion for months. Perhaps you expect me to carry my lipstick and compact tied up in a bandanna, like a pickaninny?"

"Sweetheart!" protested Mr. Benturian, slipping his arm around her waist. "Why should we quarrel, when we have each other?"

"And don't think you can nuzzle your way out of it," said Mlle. Séraphique.

"My dear," said Mr. Benturian, "tragedies involving material substance are seldom irreparable. Please do not concern yourself about it. The shops are still open, and everything will be taken care of." ★

"My daughter thought I was a dog," says Ustinov, "and barked at me"

laughs. As an actor he uses his mobile clown's face and his bulk (almost six feet, two hundred pounds) more eloquently than words. Most of his friends says he is funnier off stage than on, and one insists he is "the greatest raconteur in the land." This is not strictly accurate, for Ustinov rarely tells a story; he acts it, even if it involves ten people of different nationalities.

When Suzanne gets up in the morning she may have breakfast with her husband, dressed in pyjamas and a shapeless dressing gown. On the other hand, she may find herself sitting opposite a Prussian general about to face the firing squad, or a confidence man trying to sell her a dud car. To a straight question she may get a straight answer but she is quite likely to get a sombre lecture from a Soviet commissar on the joys of living, an argument between a Polish army officer, an Italian prisoner-of-war and an American GI, or an account of how the Moscow Dynamos were robbed of their football victory by the Fascist deviationists playing for England's Arsenal.

Ustinov speaks five languages and countless dialects, real and invented. He also sings and at odd moments of exuberance his household may be treated to a complete operatic quartet. On a recent English TV program he gave his impressions of the United States. Beginning with cab drivers and police, he satirized the entire nation, including the movie moguls in Hollywood and a complete hearing of the House committee investigating un-American activities. Shortly after this a Sunday newspaper invited its readers to suggest how they would run commercial TV, then the subject of a nation-wide controversy. One writer said, "Fire everybody and turn the whole damn thing over to Ustinov."

This suggestion is not without merit, for Ustinov's prodigious energy is usually employed on six projects at once. Last spring, for example, he celebrated his thirty-fifth birthday, while on tour in Scotland with Romanoff and Juliet, writing another play and meditating on still another. On week ends he rushed south to Bristol to watch rehearsals of The Empty Chair, a new play now awaiting a London production but then being staged by the Bristol Old Vic, breaking his journey to visit Suzanne in a maternity hospital where she awaited the birth of their second child.

Igor Nicholas Ustinov was born in April; his sister Pavla Marina is two. A French cook, a French housemaid, a Scottish nannie and an Australian secretary also inhabit the Chelsea house which, on a normal morning, is about as serene as a railway junction after a train wreck. Suzanne darts about, tending to the children and chattering in French to her husband. The cook rushes after Suzanne to discuss the menus. The housemaid carries a cup of coffee up to the drawing room for a visitor on a mission that Ustinov, habitually kind, welcomes with a warmth he cannot possibly feel. Pavla and her father converse in wildly undulating basic Chinese, disregarding the arrival of three friends who must wait as some private joke unfolds. Then Pavla yanks her father's beard, which she firmly believes to be false, and says good-by to everyone, including some workmen who have come to fix a leak in the roof. At this moment Miss Dalglish, the secretary, buzzes on the intercom. Ustinov picks up the telephone. But the caller hangs up, believing, with every good reason, that he is talking to an Italian fruit vendor who has lost a shipment of figs.

Through this confusion Suzanne moves with remarkable poise, proving she is indeed the Iron Butterfly, a name invented for her in 1950 by Orson Welles when she played Desdemona to his Othello.

"After Welles, anything is normal," she says, explaining that the name was coined to commend her stamina. "I lasted longer than any other actress who worked for him," she says. Friends agree the name is appropriate. Like her husband, Suzanne is unaffected, unassuming and unworried. She looks as little like an actress or a rich man's wife as her husband looks like an actor or a rich man. Her long dark hair is usually caught up in an elastic band. She rarely uses make-up. In a crowd she might attract no attention. But, once attracted, the attention is held captive by her candid blue eyes and a face of exceptional beauty.

"I'm what they call photogenic," she explains. "I'm told I have good bones, or something."

Neither of the Ustinovs is preoccupied with dress. Suzanne wears loose comfortable skirts that do little for her neat figure, except to make her look smaller than her five feet, two inches, and much younger than her twenty-eight years. As for her husband, a gossip columnist recently nominated him the worst-dressed man of the year, criticizing his missing buttons and the hairy tweeds he wears to cocktail parties.

"He's not like other men," says Suzanne. "He doesn't get excited by trifles like missing buttons."

"I have no interest in sartorial matters," says Ustinov, who has an eye for color that sometimes leans to fancy waistcoats and red socks, but the kind of build that would make the most inspired creation of Savile Row look like pyjamas. He also shares his wife's hatred of large cocktail parties. But the Ustinovs are not antisocial. They like small functions and a hostess who can get them as guests has no worries about the success of her party, for even Ustinov's casual remarks sound like dialogue. Some random samples:

- His bulk: "I prefer starches to grasses."
- His beard: "At first my daughter thought I was a dog and barked at me."

- Hollywood: "It's like death, the great leveler."
- Acting on TV: "It's like being asked by the captain to entertain the passengers as the ship goes down."
- A neurotic actor: "He's got an Achilles heel running all the way down his back."
- His crowded dressing room: "Laurence Olivier had a sign on his door: 'No Visitors.' I put a sign on mine: 'Visitors Welcome.' These are all his admirers."
- Reason for leaving a large hotel for a country inn: "Too many autograph hunters."
- Reason for returning next day to the large hotel: "Too few autograph hunters."
- Annual New Year's resolution: "To commit all the follies of last year this year, with better results."

"When he is about, nothing is sad and depressing," says Suzanne. "Life is happy all the time. If something goes wrong he turns it into a joke. I have never met anyone who makes me laugh so much."

The Ustinovs traveled toward their outwardly hectic but inwardly composed union by routes with only one common feature: the disappointment of their parents when they chose the theatre as a profession. Peter, born in London on April 16, 1921, began at an early age to reverse the expectations of the senior Ustinovs. His mother, artist Nadia Benois, hoped that, like her, he might be an artist. At Westminster School he rebelled against what he now calls "the cruel masquerade of dressing small boys as undertakers," did poorly at his work, was punished for writing plays in class and for imitating his masters, and established himself as a heretic beyond redemption by developing a violent loathing for cricket. "More was expected of his twelve and a half years," one of his masters reported sadly. He chose the theatre, Ustinov claims, "because I couldn't do anything else. I never passed an exam."

He left school at sixteen, put in some time at drama school and repertory and at nineteen wrote his first play, House of Regrets. It was not produced until 1942 because of the outbreak of the war, an event which did little to slow his development.

Ustinov wrote steadily during the four years he was, by his own account, "the saddest sack in our shade of khaki." He never rose above private, and says he would always have been in trouble if he hadn't acted his way out of it. Inevitably, he gravitated to the Royal Film unit where, in addition to being batman for Col. David Niven, he was put to work writing. By 1945, at twenty-four, he was writing, directing and producing a film about radar and finishing his third play and his first novel.

Until this time Suzanne, one of the six children of Edmond Cloutier, the Queen's Printer, had been attending Marguerite Bourgeoise College in Montreal. Since she was a serious-minded child, her family thought she might become a nun. But in 1945, when she was seventeen, she ran away from home with sixty-three dollars in her purse and a one-way ticket to New York. At Grand Central Station she crept fearfully up to the street where for a few minutes she stared with wide-eyed dismay at the roaring traffic. Then she plunged down again and remained in the station for three days.

"Grand Central is really quite comfortable," she says, looking back. "You can have a bath, there are places to sleep and lots of restaurants." In one of these, on the third morning, as she searched a newspaper's want ads with the help of a French-English dictionary, she struck up a conversation with a dazzling young woman who proved to be Bijou Barrington, a Conover model. To Miss Barrington's trained eye Suzanne's good bones were evident at once although the skin that covered them was white and tear-stained and their owner, wearing hair down to her waist, a skirt and sweater and flat-heeled shoes, looked about twelve years old.

"She took me to the agency, they cut off my hair, dressed me up and made a model of me," says Suzanne. Three months later, her picture was on the cover of Vogue.

"I was on lots of covers after that," she says. "I find that if you leave life alone one thing just leads to another."

In Suzanne's case it would be more accurate to say that one mentor leads to another, for seven have so far guided her career. Number one was George Stevens, the Hollywood director of A Place in the Sun. One day early in 1946, while thumbing through some stills looking for likely material for his new company, Liberty Films, Inc., he turned up a picture of Suzanne. He looked again and offered her a Hollywood contract.

Number two was Charles Laughton, whom she met during her two years in Hollywood, interrupted briefly by her wedding in Ottawa in August 1946, to a childhood friend, François La Flèche, of Montreal. While waiting for her big chance in pictures, Suzanne joined Laughton's Shakespearean company. When Liberty Films merged with Paramount and she found herself lost among the starlets, Laughton advised her to leave. "Go to Europe, get on the stage and learn to be a good actress," he urged.

"She'll go far, that one"

When Suzanne reached Paris in 1948 she had a letter of introduction from Laughton to mentor number three, the late director-actor Louis Jouvet. Through Jouvet she joined the junior Comédie Française, where she was seen by mentor number four, director Julien Duvivier. He invited her to test for the lead in his film, The Sinners, and she won the part.

The Sinners led Suzanne to mentor number five, Orson Welles. When Welles saw Suzanne on the screen, he sighed massively and announced that his quest for the perfect Desdemona was over.

"I'm a lucky girl," Suzanne told a reporter after she had signed to play opposite Welles in his production of Othello. "Of course she's lucky," boomed Welles. "But Suzie's a talented kid. She's got everything—looks, ability, and she's a hard worker. She'll go far, that one."

Mentor number six, director Marcel Carné, evidently agreed for he chose Suzanne to play the lead, in his film, Juliette (she won the part against another newcomer, Leslie Caron). As Juliette she played opposite Gérard Philipe, the matinee idol of France. This, in a round-about way, led her to lucky seven, the most important man in her life, Peter Ustinov.

One day in August 1951 Ustinov was browsing at a newsstand when his attention was caught by the photograph of a girl on the cover of a French women's magazine. It was Suzanne in her role as Juliette. Ustinov bought the magazine. That night, in London to discuss an offer from British producer Herbert Wilcox, Suzanne went to see the current stage hit, The Love of Four Colonels. After the performance her agent took her backstage to meet the star and author, Peter Ustinov.

my picture, it played in my favor," said Suzanne. "It was easy to become friends," she says. "We found we shared so many interests."

Soon after that meeting Suzanne moved to London to earn the only good notices given to Derby Day, a film starring Anna Neagle and Michael Wilding. Later she went to Hollywood to play opposite Alan Ladd and Humphrey Bogart. But the film was shelved and she returned to London to play a small part in the British screen comedy, Doctor in the House, and a large part in Ustinov's worst and most soul-searing failure.

No Sign of the Dove, a serious allegory on the Flood, closed after eleven performances. Although Suzanne played a key part she spoke only one word. But by then she was in love with the author so she suffered more acutely than the other players when it flopped. Before the end of the first act the gallery began to boo. During the last act boos greeted every entrance. When the star, Beatrix Lehmann, spoke one of her climactic lines, "I forgive you all," a voice from the gallery roared back, "That's more than we do." The critics, while deploring the churlish demonstration, agreed with the gallery.

"I was determined not to let it bother me, but in point of fact it did bother me," says Ustinov today. Two months later, after Suzanne's divorce, they were married. During the next two years, while they traveled to Hollywood, Mexico, Haiti and Europe, Ustinov wrote a film script, two plays, part of a novel, and acted in five films. Meanwhile he was, as always, adding to his curiously diversified store of knowledge.

He is an expert on fast cars and many other esoteric subjects. He has a remarkable memory for incident and fact, and is an insatiable reader, particularly of newspapers. "I have just finished reading a complete account of the Peninsular wars in some old copies of The Examiner," he said recently. "Fascinating!"

"He reads the Encyclopædia Britannica in bed. He's up to S," says Suzanne, who classes this, and a constitutional inability to be on time for anything but a curtain, as his only bad habits.

As busy and successful as they have been, the Ustinovs have refused to let either time or hunger for success tyrannize over their lives. "I am not ambitious for a career in the abstract sense," says Suzanne. "I've had one. I may act again if the right opportunity presents itself, but right now I have enough to do. You can't just have babies and leave them."

"I don't want to be successful," says Ustinov. "Success is dangerous. You're apt to rest on your laurels. My ambition is to be a night watchman—all that time to think up ideas and no need to do anything about them. In life there are always compensations, always ups and downs and always hope. But the greatest privilege of all, which is of far greater value than success, is the privilege of being happily married."

Suzanne agrees. "I would never try to change him—I couldn't," she says. "Anyway, I love him—beard, long hair, red socks and all." ★

"The Arabs vowed war until the Jews were exterminated. The Jews believed they meant it"

interview but were constantly interrupted by a small boy charging in to grab a handful of pretzels and charging out again. Beigin scolded him mildly but the small boy obviously knew Daddy wouldn't hurt a fly.

In an hour's talk Beigin spent eighty percent of the time sympathetically explaining the government action in invading the Sinai and only twenty percent of the time criticizing Ben-Gurion for agreeing to withdraw. He also thought Israel could and should have knocked off Jordan at the same time and advanced the eastern frontier to the west bank of the River Jordan. Actually many think Israel intended to do just that but was deterred by the British warning that Britain's mutual-assistance treaty with Jordan would be honored.

Altogether, I got the strong impression that Beigin felt Ben-Gurion was on the right track and saw his own party's role as one of counselor, guide and prod. Indeed his most heartfelt criticism seemed to be based on Ben-Gurion's refusal to admit how similar their aims were.

"Wouldn't it have been more dignified to admit or at least not deny our intentions," Beigin asked, "rather than make speeches that we'd never wage a preventive war and a fortnight later do just that?" Others wondered the same thing.

Officially the Israeli decision to invade the Sinai was prompted by the election of a pro-Nasser government in Jordan and the conclusion of the tripartite treaty up-lying the command of Syria and Jordan under Egypt. This, following the resumption of Fedayeen activity from Gaza, was said to be the last straw. But these developments came in the last week of October, only days before the mobilization which astounded observers by its smoothness, speed and efficiency. All bespoke careful planning for much longer than a few days.

The onlooker's judgment of the Arab-Israeli dispute is usually determined and betrayed by the date at which he begins. The Israeli case is strongest if you begin in 1948. Three things cannot be denied: the Arabs started the war against Israel; the Arabs were ignominiously defeated and put to flight by an army they vastly outnumbered; the Arabs nevertheless refused to make peace and ever since have claimed the protection of the armistice plus belligerent rights. For instance, Egypt blockaded the Israeli port of Eilat by seizing the empty sandbar island of Tiran at the mouth of the Gulf of Aqaba on the Red Sea—Egypt doesn't own the island but justified its blockade of international shipping as a "belligerent right." Other Arab countries were too weak for such overt acts but unceasingly shouted threats to drive the Jews into the sea.

In practice, though, there have been ups and downs, periods of quiet followed by periods of hostility approaching open war. The Sinai invasion was the climax of one such warlike interval which began nearly two years ago.

The Israeli often say it started in June 1955 when Nasser made his deal for Soviet arms. United Nations observers place it earlier than that. They start with the Israeli attack on a Gaza police post on Feb. 28, 1955. By now, so much blood has been spilt on both sides that any raid in either direction can plausibly be called retaliatory. However, UN observers say the 1955 Israeli assault on Gaza was far beyond the ordinary. It followed hard upon the return of Ben-Gurion as defense minister, the long-time advocate of a reprisal policy, and greatly exceeded the scale of previous attacks in the Gaza district. Besides attacking the police post, the Israeli set ambushes on the roads leading to Gaza and waited for reinforcements to arrive. A truckload of Egyptian soldiers ran into an ambush and all thirty-four of them were shot dead. Altogether, about forty Egyptians and Arabs were killed that night.

Nasser said later that it was the Gaza raid that prompted him to negotiate his arms deal with the Soviets. Nasser's word is not regarded as being worth much at the moment but UN observers are inclined to believe him on this point. It is also true that until the Gaza affair the raids into Israel from the Arab side were more like individual banditry than organized military operations. Thereafter the situation changed. As well as concluding the arms deal, Nasser organized the Fedayeen as a recognized branch of the Egyptian Army. He proclaimed them as the start of a Palestine brigade, and paraded them in Cairo with the regular army. They were trained for sabotage and other so-called commando duties. The Fedayeen record is actually most inglorious. They do best at either blowing up irrigation pipes and powerlines when nobody is around or at murdering unarmed men, women and children. But, unlike the previous infiltrations, these were admitted incursions by military force—in short, acts of war and so proclaimed by officers who lauded the "heroic exploits of our furtive hit-and-run troops."

Of course, the Israeli reprisals, equally deliberate and far better planned and executed, might be called acts of war too. The difference was that whereas Israel steadfastly maintained her sole objective was peace, the Arabs grew ever more shrill and bloodthirsty, vowing war until the Jews were exterminated.

Apparently Israel came more and more to believe they meant it. Since early 1956 Israeli behavior along the border has been consistently challenging. They adopted the policy the UN calls "aggressive patrolling." An Israeli patrol would charge directly at the border opposite an Egyptian post. At the very edge, the armored vehicles would stop and young men would jump out, fall flat on their bellies, mount machine guns and aim with their rifles at the Egyptian sentries, and then stop. This was well calculated to terrify an Egyptian sentry. Sometimes he would panic and fire a shot or two—then the Israeli patrol would "retaliate" and clobber the Egyptian post.

By early April a tense situation had been built up. Along its southern borders Israel has established Kibbutzim— communal farms—of a rather special character. They're peopled not by ordinary farm families but by young men and women who haven't yet completed their military service. They're given the option of serving their final year in the army or going instead to a border Kibbutz. The result is that the border Kibbutzim are really military strong-points as well as farms. After exchanges of fire during two days in April, Egyptians fired mortars into one such border farm.

The Israeli response was to shell the open city of Gaza.

I heard about the shelling of Gaza from an American artilleryman who was there. "The whole thing only lasted about twenty minutes," he said, "including the pause in the middle."

What did he mean, the pause in the middle?

"It's an old trick," the American said in a level voice, "but it works with green troops and it works with civilians. If you're ordered to fire ten rounds and you have green troops against you you fire five rounds and then stop. They'll come out of their foxholes and look around to see what damage you've done. You wait until they're out and then you fire the other five rounds."

"The Israeli used that trick on Gaza." When the shelling finally stopped there were sixty-two dead and about two hundred wounded. In November when Gaza was in Israeli hands an American doctor asked an Israeli major, "What did you do it for?"

The major, a big round-faced blond with a merry grin, laughed and said, "That was an invitation to war that the Egyptians were too yellow to accept."

But if Gaza didn't bring war, it didn't bring peace either. Some of the most horrible Fedayeen raids followed the shelling of Gaza, including the worst of all—the cold-blooded murder by machine-gun fire of schoolchildren at prayer. It was a tense summer. In August alone 105 complaints were laid with the UN Mixed Armistice Commission. Israel laid forty complaints and suffered two killed and twelve wounded; Egypt laid sixty-five complaints and suffered twenty-two killed and five wounded.

Then, in September, the emphasis suddenly shifted to the Jordan border. There were various incidents—buses ambushed, all the dreary routine of terror and the equally dreary routine of reprisal. But

The character that never changes

We always have Canadian "74" Sherry and "74" Port in the house. We like both wines and we serve them often. None of our friends has ever turned down a glass of either. They're both so pleasantly smooth and light.

What I like particularly about "74" Sherry and "74" Port is that the character stays the same all evening. There's no melting ice cubes in it — just the pure goodness of sound Canadian wines.

one incident was a somewhat disturbing departure from the routine.

One Sabbath, a party of archaeologists was inspecting the ancient ruins at Ramat Rahel, just inside Israel and not far from Jerusalem. Suddenly a burst of gunfire came from Jordan. Six of the scholarly party were killed.

The UN Armistice Commission heard of it immediately. The Jordan district commander telephoned and said, "Something terrible has happened. One of our soldiers went mad and fired into a party of civilians on the Israeli side. I don't know any details but I fear some were killed. We have the killer in custody. Please come at once."

The UN observers came at once and found eyewitnesses who bore out the Jordan story. They got a complete account from a Franciscan priest who was with the party and others confirmed his version—all the shots appeared to come from one gun. Observers asked both sides if the evidence was complete and both said yes.

Hours later the UN received a call from Israel saying we have more witnesses and want to reopen the case. The new witnesses all said the fire came from more than one direction and indicated a deliberate attack.

When the UN still believed the original eyewitnesses and disregarded the afterthought evidence Israel walked out of the Armistice Commission.

The UN observers were not surprised when a few nights later they got a call to "a retaliatory raid" on the Jordan village of Husan, near Jerusalem. Thirty people had been killed.

Thereafter no complaints came from the Israeli side, since she had withdrawn from the commission, but UN observers speculated where the next retaliatory raid would be. Studying the map they guessed it would be the police post at Kalkilyeh, not far from Tel Aviv on the edge of the coastal plain. Sure enough the press soon reported the shooting of a farmer in an orange grove in that neighborhood and shortly thereafter came a retaliatory raid.

This time, though, the Jordan army had apparently done the same map study as the UN officers. It was present in considerable strength and, though at least forty-two Jordanians were killed, the Israeli themselves lost eighteen dead and more wounded. Kalkilyeh was the last major incident before the Sinai war. It was one reason why many thought the Israeli mobilization was directed against Jordan, especially since Jordan had just elected a pro-Nasser government and signed the treaty for joint command with Egypt. Whether it was the actual intention frustrated by the British warning, or a masterpiece of military deception we probably will never know, but probably the latter since Nasser was obviously the major enemy.

In Israeli eyes Nasser is the enemy not only of Israel but of the whole free world. They call him Agent No. 1 in the Soviet penetration of the Middle East and cite their capture of Egyptian arms in the Sinai to prove it. Of one hundred tanks and self-propelled guns captured, about thirty were Russian. Of nine Egyptian planes shot down, five were Russian. The Israeli tell of overhearing short-wave radio conversations in Russian in the Sinai desert before the invasion.

They reject as preposterous the notion that their Gaza raid of two years ago drove Nasser into Russian arms. He was an opportunist who would have found his way there anyway, and rather sooner than later, they say. They did the world a service by bringing him down a peg and believe that if they'd been let alone they could have brought him down utterly and forever.

Among Israeli civilians there is fierce resentment over the intervention by Britain and France, which they think tarnished and frustrated Israel's victory. Not even in London did I hear such scathing remarks about Eden as in Jerusalem.

One senior official told me quite seriously that had Britain and France minded their own business, Israel would now hold the Suez Canal from end to end. When I asked whether Egypt might not have flattened Tel Aviv if the RAF hadn't destroyed its air force, he replied, "If the Egyptians had dared bomb our cities we would have gone on to Cairo. If we had been let alone we might be in Cairo today with the peace signed."

Israeli soldiers know this fantasy is unfair. They admit the British and French air attack was extremely useful. They also admit they counted on it in making their own plans.

General Moshe Dayan, the burly one-eyed rough diamond who is Israel's chief of staff, was asked if he knew British and French help was coming. He laughed, "If I did, would I say 'yes' to you here? I will say this—we took all possibilities into account. We had intelligence reports on the build-up of Anglo-French forces in Cyprus. We took them into consideration in making our decisions."

The West wants Arab friendship

That's the nearest any official source has come to admitting collusion among Britain, France and Israel. As any divorce lawyer knows, collusion is a difficult thing either to prove or disprove, but the vehement denials by the three governments are borne out by the result. If they did attempt to co-ordinate their activities they certainly did it very badly. The lack of any co-ordination seems the chief cause of the impasse in Suez which, in turn, causes Israeli indignation.

But if Israel is exasperated by the British and French, she is even more so by the Americans. To the Israeli it seems crystal clear that the thing for the free world to do now is to recognize Nasser as a Russian stooge and the other Arab nations as willing imitators, and back Israel to the hilt. That, they feel, would solve all Middle Eastern problems in the quickest possible manner.

The Arabs believe equally strongly that the war proved their contention that Israel is the real threat to peace in the Middle East and the Communist threat is a mere bogey. They think the rest of the world is now convinced they are right and may well be encouraged to give them stronger physical support.

The most important fact to keep always in mind out here is this: there are no right answers in the Middle East. There is an infinite variety of wrong answers and some are wronger than others, but the time is long gone when any can possibly be right.

The Israeli solution takes for granted, as do most Jews throughout the world, that the interests of Israel and other free nations are virtually identical. This unfortunately is not so. From a strictly material viewpoint the Western alliance has far more interest in preserving the friendship of the Arab world, which is increasingly incompatible with supporting Israel.

Morally, of course, the commitment to uphold Israel is inescapable. Britain created the Jewish national home in the first place and whether that decision was right or wrong the British cannot go back on it now.

This support is almost instinctive. Israel is the twentieth century's bridgehead in a petrified forest of the Middle Ages. She is the only stable and competent democracy in the whole region. To let the Arabs have their way and destroy Israel would be not only dishonorable but unthinkable.

But it is equally unthinkable to permit the Arab nations to become hopelessly and permanently alienated. The Arab nations own and control assets that are absolutely essential to the West. Without Middle Eastern oil, neither European armies nor European industries can operate for long, at least not without great expense and difficulty, as the Suez crisis is now demonstrating.

This is no mere matter of pounds, shillings and pence. It might well become a matter of survival. That's why last autumn's events have placed the Western world in such a desperate dilemma.

The few glimmers of light visible at all are faint indeed, and only for the long future. For instance, one thing that could eventually become a benefit for the West, as well as for Israel, is the smashing of the Egyptian blockade of Port Eilat.

Egypt had no right to be there in the first place. The blockade was itself in defiance of previous United Nations resolutions. Israel has promised to withdraw from Egyptian territory, but neither Tiran Island nor the Gaza Strip were ever Egyptian. The Gaza Strip did lie outside the armistice line, so Israel may be compelled to vacate Gaza (which would relieve her of the refugee headache anyway), but the armistice says nothing about Tiran, from which the Egyptian blockade operated. Israel, having ousted the Egyptian garrison, will fight long and hard before letting it get back.

Eilat, as well as Suez, gives Israel access to export markets in East Africa and the Far East. It is possible, as Israel hopes, that these markets might enable it to become self-sufficient rather than dependent on Western help for two thirds of its imports. If Israel does become self-sufficient, a major obstacle to peace in the Middle East will be removed.

The Arab refusal to recognize Israel's existence sounds hysterical but has a rational basis. The Arabs simply do not believe Israel can survive. Educated Arabs remember the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, which also depended on Western help prompted by religious fervor — Christian Zionism. Eventually Christian Zionism went out of fashion and the kingdom of Jerusalem disappeared, but not until it had lasted one hundred and nineteen years. The Arabs doubt Israel will last that long.

If they're convinced Israel is able to stand on its own feet economically, then the rational basis for non-recognition will disappear. The way might become clear for a general settlement between Israel and its neighbors, without which no stability is possible in the Middle East.

But that's a matter for the very far future, if ever. The immediate outlook is almost completely black.

Far from keeping the friendship of the Arab world, Europeans cannot even walk the streets in safety. Damascus hotels which once catered to foreign tourists are now virtually closed, their windows shuttered against the stones of the mob. The thirty-six Europeans and North Americans left in Damascus stay close to home and walk about as little as possible. Even the United Nations white jeep and blue arm band are no longer protection from black looks and threatening words. In Old Jerusalem, foreigners don't dare enter the old walled city even by daylight. All hotels but one have closed and United Nations personnel have been ordered to live together in that one, no longer in the comfortable flats they once enjoyed.

All this I learn by hearsay in Israel's half of Jerusalem which, of course, is cut off from all contact with the Arab nations except through radio.

Tomorrow I take off again to see what more I can of the Arab world. ★ acre lake that resembled a caldron of simmering treacle.

Every trick known for "killing" a gusher was tried. Ten thousand bags of oats and cotton seed were pumped down the drill hole in the hope that they would swell and block it. But the gusher vomited them back. The same thing happened to four carloads of cement. Three weeks went by and the oil continually overran its dikes and spread further over the land. On seeing McMahon one day, Rebus said: "I thought you said there'd be no mess."

For six months the oil ran wild. The heaving mass began to lap the feet of an oil rig. Near the rig a huge blister of earth and oil arose and then precipitately sank, leaving behind a boiling crater. Slowly the huge rig reeled over, fell into the cavity, and was swallowed up in the morass. Broken electrical connections gave off a shower of sparks. In a flash Atlantic No. 3 was on fire. Flames leaped more than a hundred feet into the air. Newspapermen from all over Canada and the United States flew in. Even British newspapers sent representatives. Printed in the pink final edition of the Toronto Telegram a full front-page picture of the fire suggested a corner of hell.

One night Rebus stood at his front door, his face lurid in the light of the flames. McMahon who was hurrying by cried: "You're rich, Rebus. You're a millionaire!" Rebus replied: "No danger, eh? Hah!"

From either side of the burning lake two inclined tunnels were bored toward the base of the spouting drill hole. Down the tunnels tightly rolled balls of steel cable, like big balls of knitting wool, were rammed. When the balls were pushed through to the base of the drill hole, which now resembled an upturned funnel, they sprang open, filling the funnel with a mass of tangled wire. Into this ravel were blown tens of thousands of old golf balls. Under the pressure of the oil the golf balls popped upward, lodged in every orifice of the wire, and formed a ceiling which prevented the oil going up the drill hole. To ensure complete oil tightness of the ceiling thousands of bags of chicken feathers were blown into the mixture of wire and golf balls. The well stopped gushing. For want of fuel the flames above died down.

Six months to the day from the date of its proving Atlantic No. 3 was brought under control. Only a huge black scar remained to mark the scene of the conflagration. "That awful fire," says McMahon, "consumed more than a million dollars worth of oil. But under the circumstances I can't complain."

During the next six months Atlantic No. 3 yielded one million two hundred thousand barrels of oil, which sold for more than three million dollars. The publicity brought a flood of investment capital into McMahon's companies. This financed intensified exploration for oil and began a discovery and development boom on which McMahon's companies have flourished ever since. Pacific Pete's shares have risen from fifty cents to more than thirteen dollars each.

A year after the fire McMahon plucked up courage to visit Rebus. He found the farmer stolidly nailing patches over holes in an old barn. "Don't you realize," said McMahon, "that you've already made yourself four hundred thousand dollars in royalties on top of the two hundred thousand I gave you for the oil rights? Why don't you knock that old barn down and build yourself a new one?" John Rebus said: "Why don't you keep your promise and give me that new kitchen stove?" McMahon grinned and said: "That's what I came about. When you go home for your dinner you'll find the stove in the kitchen."

It was a gas stove, and it symbolized McMahon's newest venture. Since the late Twenties he had been dreaming of piping natural gas into homes and factories. From Dr. George Hume, then a government geologist in Ottawa and now one of McMahon's executives, he had learned during the Depression that there were huge reserves of natural gas straddling the British Columbia-Alberta border of the Peace River country.

If this gas could be tapped and piped to Vancouver, McMahon reasoned, new industries would be attracted to the city and a market would be assured. In working out the initial figures, however, McMahon discovered that Vancouver's consumption alone would not justify for years the cost of seven hundred miles of thirty-inch pipe. To make such a pipe pay the American Pacific-coast cities of Seattle and Portland would have to become customers.

From this premise McMahon advanced in 1945 into a complicated and bitter series of industrial negotiations. First of all, as another subsidiary of Pacific Pete, he formed the Peace River Natural Gas Company to do exploratory drilling. His first obstacle was getting the right to drill.

Since 1936 the B.C. government had kept in force a crown reserve on natural gas. This meant that all gas belonged to the government and only the government was allowed to drill for it. For two years McMahon tried to persuade the B.C. cabinet to lift the restriction. In 1947 the government relented. At eight o'clock on the morning the government reserve came off gas, McMahon was in Victoria. For a few cents an acre he took out drilling permits Numbers One, Two and Three.

Four years later the Peace River Natural Gas Company made its first strike at Fort St. John, forty miles up the Alaska Highway of B.C. Drilling continued eastward and by 1952 seventy-five wells in the B.C. and Alberta reaches of the Peace River country had been capped. One and a half trillion cubic feet of gas, enough to supply Vancouver, Seattle and Portland for twenty years, was waiting to be piped southward. McMahon floated the Westcoast Transmission Company Ltd., still another subsidiary of Pacific Pete, to build and operate his pipeline.

While his exploration for gas was proceeding, however, new developments in the United States threatened disaster. A group headed by the Wall Street financial house of Morgan Stanley and Company formed a corporation named Northwest Natural Gas. The object of this corporation was to pipe gas from southern Alberta to Seattle, Portland and Vancouver.

If Northwest succeeded McMahon would lose his markets, as well as many of the millions he had invested in Peace River exploration.

Northwest was a formidable rival. On its board sat H. R. MacMillan and Austin Taylor, two immensely wealthy B.C. industrialists. Northwest's lawyer was Ralph Campney, now Canadian Minister of National Defense.

But McMahon fought Northwest. He fought it before the Alberta Petroleum and Natural Gas Conservation Board, where Northwest opposed his plea for a permit to move Alberta Peace River gas over the B.C. border into the pipe that would convey it south. The two firms fought again before the federal Board of Transport Commissioners where Northwest opposed McMahon's bid for a permit to move Canadian gas into the U.S.

And indirectly McMahon fought Northwest in the House of Commons in Ottawa where his application for federal incorporation of his pipeline company, Westcoast Transmission, was opposed by members who were more sympathetic toward Northwest's claims. But in the end McMahon got what he wanted, largely on the ground that the Peace River country offered the most logical source of gas for markets on the north Pacific coast. This battle lasted from 1946 to 1949.

If McMahon found it tough he found a second battle in the U.S. twice as tough.

McMahon still needed permission from the U.S. Federal Power Commission to pipe his gas across the border. Defense officials in Washington were opposed to McMahon's project because they didn't want Seattle and Portland dependent on a foreign source of gas which might be cut off in the event of war. Lined up with these opponents were the American companies, Pacific Northwest Pipeline, El Paso Natural Gas, Colorado Interstate, and Pacific Gas and Electric, which were planning to pipe gas themselves to Seattle and Portland from wells in New Mexico and Texas. Although McMahon had a U.S. champion in the Portland Gas and Coke Company, which wanted to circulate his Peace River gas because it would be nearer, and therefore cheaper, this time his cause failed. In 1954, after two and a half years of hearings, the Federal Power Commission turned thumbs down on his dream. McMahon had spent two million dollars on legal expenses. Now it looked as if his Peace River wells would remain capped for half a century.

But McMahon is resilient. He started negotiating with Ray C. Fish, who as head of the Pacific Northwest Pipeline Corporation, played a large part in blocking his entry to the U.S. Eventually the two reached a compromise. Instead of Peace River gas running across the border in Westcoast pipes, as McMahon had originally hoped, it would be taken by Westcoast to Vancouver, and onward to the little B.C. border hamlet of Huntingdon. There it would stop. The gas would be metered, bought by Pacific Northwest and fed into an American network of pipes.

"It was not exactly what I wanted," says McMahon, "but it was an awfully good deal." The American company agreed to buy a little under half the pipe's capacity. This, plus the sales assured in Vancouver, guaranteed McMahon sufficient income to amortize the cost of the projected pipeline and to leave a fair profit.

Within a few days construction of the hundred-and-eighty-million-dollar line was begun with funds lent by such financial giants as the Metropolitan Life, Sun Life and New York Life insurance companies and the First National Bank, the Mellon Bank, and the Royal Bank of Canada. The pipeline will open next spring. "That occasion," says McMahon, "will be marked by a happy party."

McMahon's enemies say that the Westcoast pipeline victory went to his head and prompted him to jump impulsively into a league too big for him. They refer to his dramatic intervention last spring in the parliamentary crisis over C. D. Howe's proposal to lend Canadian government funds to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company for its much-debated pipeline from Alberta to Ontario and Quebec. McMahon made a public offer to take over the job without state aid. Opposition Leader George Drew asked why the American-controlled Trans-Canada should be subsidized when a Canadian was ready to tackle the operation without subsidy. The question provoked a Donnybrook Fair. As the battle raged in the House McMahon suddenly withdrew his offer in a telegram to C. D. Howe. Neither McMahon nor Howe has ever explained fully what kind of agreement they reached before the dispatch of the telegram.

At least one mining man holds this theory: McMahon knew he could never raise the money privately to lay the cross-Canada pipe, but he thought that by pretending he would bluff the government and the Trans-Canada company into cutting him in on the job. C. D. Howe called his bluff in a telephone conversation. Howe told McMahon to "put up or shut up." Thereupon McMahon withdrew his offer.

Recently McMahon himself smiled and said: "I could have raised the money and I was quite ready to do so. I did have communications on the matter with Mr. Howe but I don't wish to aggravate the controversy by going into what was said. All I can say is that I realized the government would have had great difficulty in getting out of its arrangement with Trans-Canada. Things had gone so far they'd become very complicated. For this, and other reasons, I decided it would be in the best interests of Canada if I withdrew my offer."

McMahon made the statement in his

My most memorable meal: No. 12

John Norman Harris

My gravy (or was it?) in prison

There were four of us who messed together at Luckenwald prison camp, and we were hungrier than we had ever been in that spring of 1945, because Red Cross parcels couldn't get through on the well-bombed railways. We talked and dreamed of food, and that first enormous meal in the freedom that was coming.

Yet my most memorable meal came before freedom, and was made from prison-camp ingredients. We were celebrating a birthday or something, so we went flat out to prepare a feast.

We had potatoes which we mashed and creamed with powdered milk, but, to add that extra touch, I made a gravy by browning some flour, a rare delicacy obtained in trade, in margarine, and stirring in water and salt (there was no pepper).

The result was smooth and thick and it did something for the eternal potatoes. It caused an argument, though, for Paget, who was Eton and Oxford, said it wasn't gravy but sauce, since it hadn't been broiled out of an animal. Gravy in such a context was non-U.

But the great event was the pudding, fashioned by J. Ewart Prudham, now deputy treasurer of Scarborough Township. He directed our efforts as we tore immense quantities — about sixteen thin slices — of black bread into minute fragments. Cutting it wouldn't get the proper effect. Then he tore up some long-hoarded Red Cross prunes and raisins, and shredded one heaven-sent carrot into the mass, bundled it in a ball and wrapped it in some sort of oiled paper.

When it was steamed over our homemade chip stove, which burned bits of bed-boards whittled off with a dull table knife, the pudding swelled to an enormous size and took on a rich, fruity flavor. Finally we had a sauce, not a gravy, for the pudding. Harry Bastable, an immense Winnipeg Irishman, grated an American D-ration chocolate bar into powdered milk and creamed it with tender care.

Potatoes and gra—beg pardon, sauce—and chocolate-coated pudding, washed down with genuine powdered coffee—that, for some reason, is the meal I remember, more than any of the steaks and plum puddings I have eaten since.

DOMINION SEED HOUSE

apartment on the sixteenth floor of an elegant building opposite the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on Park Avenue, New York. Its heavy pile carpets, custom-built furnishings and delicate Japanese murals are indicative of his good but expensive tastes. His permanent home, a big modern house in Calvin, on the outskirts of Calgary, has a basement decorated in oak and brass to suggest an old English inn. He rents permanent hotel suites in Ottawa, Vancouver, Los Angeles and San Francisco. Between these cities he is constantly traveling in his Lockheed Lodestar airliner, often carrying with him half a dozen lawyers, engineers and secretaries. The aircraft, piloted by a crew of TCA veterans, has an office and a bedroom. There are weeks when McMahon sleeps and works more hours aloft than he does on the ground. Sometimes he passes the time in the air by playing poker and gin rummy with his executives.

McMahon is often absent for weeks from Pacific Pete's new ten-story building in Calgary, his official headquarters. His office is one of several in the top-floor executive suite. A walk down a corridor brings McMahon to a well-appointed apartment where he may spend the night if he wishes to work late. Adjoining the apartment, for the entertainment of company guests, is a huge lounge with chocolate-and-white rugs, fawn-colored armchairs and settees, and a big stone fireplace with a polished copper canopy.

McMahon sometimes relaxes with a drink as he works out his deals. "I have never seen him tense or excited," says one of his executives. When he's cooking up something really big the only sign of strain McMahon shows is an occasional drumming of his feet on the floor under his desk.

At his desk McMahon rarely has before him more than one piece of paper. He delegates detail work to his brothers, George and John, and to a retinue of vice-presidents. If he is handed a long memorandum a frown clouds his usually sunny smile. "Please bring it down to fifty words," he says. This is about the sharpest rebuke he's ever been heard to utter. He has no lofty airs. Senior staffers call him "Frank" and juniors "Mister Frank." He's not fond of "sir."

McMahon's features are familiar in the offices of several other companies. He's a director of Alberta Phoenix Tube and Pipe Ltd., of Edmonton, a subsidiary of a German company. He also sits on the board of Northwest Nitro-Chemicals, of Medicine Hat, and of Canadian Collieries Ltd., owners of big coal and lumber properties on Vancouver Island.

Seven years ago he founded Alberta Distillers Ltd., of Calgary. While the company was waiting for its first batches of whisky to mature McMahon suggested it should make vodka, a spirit that requires no ageing. The vodka was produced just as a craze swept New York for Moscow Mules and Bloody Marys, and the distillery did a landslide export business. Vodka is barred by the B.C. Liquor Control Board but recently, as a special concession, a few of McMahon's bottles were allowed to be opened at a reception in Vancouver. The guest of honor was Dimitri Shepilov, the Russian foreign minister, who tasted the vodka and said: "No so good as the Russian, of course, but quite good." Now the company is selling its first batches of seven-year-old rye. McMahon, who is never satisfied to let a company coast, also has his firm producing a liqueur made out of rye and maple syrup as a competitor to the Scottish Drambuie.

Among his long-term plans is open-cut mining of the Athabaska tar sands in northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories. This is the greatest unexploited oil reserve in the world. And it is all on the surface. The snag is the distance of the oil from industrial centres and the expense of separating it from the sand which gives it the consistency and appearance of black fudge. Pacific Pete shares three hundred and fifty thousand acres of the sands and has already spent fifteen million dollars on experiments in refining them. One method, which McMahon may eventually settle for, is boiling the sand in water. "Certainly," he says, "the days when Athabaska oil will be used are much nearer than most people expect."

Despite his pre-occupation with business McMahon devotes plenty of time to pleasure. His favorite hobby is Alberta Ranches Ltd., a racing stable he shares with Max Bell, the publisher of the Calgary Albertan, and Wilder Ripley, an Alberta industrialist. Its forty-odd horses, some Canadian-born, but mostly imports from England, Ireland, New Zealand, Australia and France, are worth two million dollars. Entries are flown to racetracks all over the United States, Canada and England.

The most valuable horse in the stable is Royal Serenade, son of England's famed Royal Charger. Bought in England in 1952 for twenty thousand dollars, he won the hundred-thousand-dollar Hollywood Gold Cup and the fifty-thousand-dollar American Handicap. Now retired to stud, Royal Serenade commands a service fee of two thousand dollars and his yearlings fetch at sales between fifteen and twenty thousand dollars each.

McMahon's horses are trained by Vance Longden, at Okotoks, just south of Calgary, and at Riverside, forty miles east of Los Angeles. They are ridden in important races by the trainer's famous father, Johnny Longden, the Canadian who has ridden more winners than any other jockey. Johnny Longden and McMahon are close friends.

McMahon has as many friends in the theatrical profession as he has on the race-tracks. Among them is Frederick Brisson, the son of the old Danish matinee idol Carl Brisson, and husband of Rosalind Russell, star of the latest Broadway hit, Auntie Mame. A few years ago Frederick Brisson, a producer, needed seventy-five thousand dollars to put into a show named The Pajama Game. He handed a copy of the script to McMahon who read it, liked it, and put up the money. The Pajama Game was so successful that McMahon tripled his stake. He also backed two other hits, Damn Yankees and Plain and Fancy.

Another of McMahon's theatrical friends is Bing Crosby. They went to school together in Spokane. McMahon was then living in Moyie, his birthplace, just across the B.C. border from Spokane. His father, a hotelman, sent him to a private school in Spokane.

Young Frank left school at sixteen to diamond drill for base metals at four dollars a day in the Sullivan Mine at Kimberley, B.C. Later, for ten years, he roamed from Alaska to Mexico working for drilling contractors. In the mid-Twenties he was drilling for two Americans and when they found gas near Vancouver—about enough to heat a dozen farm houses—McMahon grasped the significance of their quest.

He made enough money out of diamond drilling to set up in partnership with his brothers in the middle Thirties. By the time he brought in his first gusher in 1939 his plans for an eventual move into the natural gas field were cut and dried.

McMahon's restless, wandering life led to some domestic unhappiness. A few years ago he was divorced from the first Mrs. McMahon, who later married a young movie actor and settled in Hollywood. Early last year McMahon married Betty Betz.

McMahon remains devoted to his children by his first wife and his several grandchildren. His older son Frank was killed in a car crash four years ago. The young man's widow later married Max Bell, one of McMahon's best friends. McMahon's surviving son Bill owns his own construction business and works on the Alaska Highway.

When McMahon's daughter Marion married in 1954 McMahon gave her the most dazzling wedding Calgary had ever seen. The Anglican Cathedral was decorated with white peonies, carnations, orchids and gladioli. Preceded by thirty choir boys and followed by eleven attendants, the bride walked to the altar over a carpet of white rose petals. The flowers, which were arranged by an expert flown from Hollywood, cost four thousand five hundred dollars. After the service more than six hundred guests entered the Palliser Hotel over a white broadloom carpet and sat down to a chicken and champagne wedding breakfast at tables covered with white lace. Many of the guests had been flown to Calgary from all over North America and quartered in the Palliser at McMahon's expense. After the departure of the bride and groom parties continued in the Palliser for three days. McMahon is reputed to have picked up a tab for more than twenty thousand dollars. The wedding would have cost still more if he had succeeded in his attempt to hire Mantovani.

At the reception, as McMahon stood beaming amid the scent of cigars, the lilt of music, the swirl of fashionably dressed dancers and the pop of champagne corks, one of his guests remarked to a Calgary newspaperwoman: "Isn't it refreshing to see one millionaire who is not ashamed to throw his money around and enjoy himself. If Frank had been born fifty years sooner he'd have made a perfect pal for Edward the Seventh." ★

"Schools teach a make-believe correctness that has practically no currency outside the class"

more than one man a promotion in the British Foreign Office, a snobbery that led Churchill to write: "This is the sort of English up with which I will not put."

This idea that the preposition should always precede the word it governs, that it is better to say "the man to whom I had written" than "the man I had written to," has become widely accepted, although the idiom is perfectly good English. It has been condemned because it wasn't found in Latin or in languages derived from Latin. How consonant it is with speech rhythms, the vigor and conciseness it adds, when skilfully used, can be appreciated in Bacon: "Houses are built to live in, and not look on," and "Revenge is a kind of wild justice, which the more man's nature runs to, the more ought law to weed it out"; or in Addison: "Odd and uncommon characters are the game that I look for, and most delight in."

There's a story of a little girl who said, "I want to be read to," and her mother replied, "What do you want to be read to out of?" This goes on until the mother, bringing the wrong book upstairs, is asked, "Now why did you bring that book that I do not want to be read to out of up for?" Obviously she was no college product or she would have known that a preposition is a bad word to end a sentence with.

Too subtle for textbooks

The split infinitive is considered inelegant, and "this here" a vulgarism, but both were once in good taste and are linguistically defensible. "Try and stop me" or "try and go" resist all efforts at changing to "try to" because the former have a speech rhythm that the latter lacks. "Irregardless" is more emphatic than "regardless."

School authorities seldom understand the nature of language and usually direct their energies to teaching a make-believe correctness that has practically no currency outside the classroom. Language is too subtle a register of human relations and thought to trust it to textbooks. For example, an English-speaking mother says to her child, "John, be good!"; a French mother says, "Jean, sois sage!" (be wise); a Swedish mother, "Jan, var snäll!" (be friendly); a German mother, "Han, sei artig!" (get back in line); and a Hopi mother, "No, no, no—that's not the Hopi way."

Language can reflect politics. Both English and German added new words during the Second World War, but how different they were! Americans coined the terms amputee, draftee, dischargee, payee, to denote roles of the little man, but there were no corresponding "-er" words (employee-employer), no terms for the men who amputated, drafted, discharged or paid. But in German the opposite was true. New words denoted leaders, not the led, commanders, not those commanded.

Language can reflect class. In Japanese and Javanese, for example, the speaker, through grammar, must indicate the listener's status relative to himself.

Language can reflect character. In Chaucer's English "up" in post position meant a loss of personal strength: to throw up, give up, die up, yield up, surrender up. Today it means the reverse—a strengthening of the self: to face up, speak up, clean up, fix up. Unlike "out" (to work out, think out, clean out), "up" implies speed, direction, strength. Yet conservative grammarians oppose this exciting, spontaneous use of "up" as not good English.

But what excites the purists most is phrases like "Jeat jet?" for "Have you eaten yet?" This involves, of course, more than words alone. It concerns grammatical categories, which are the very basis of thought. "Jeat jet?" involves a codification of experience quite different from "Have you eaten yet?" It's not just sloppy diction, adolescent indifference to language. Every language is open-ended—that is, designed for change. English is no exception. In spite of the efforts of academicians, spoken English is becoming polysynthetic. Sentences are less frequently composed of little words chronologically ordered, more frequently of tight conglomerates that are phrases in their own right, both in sound and meaning.

Spoken English is freeing itself from the printed page. Print never accurately recorded English. It left out tones and gesture, destroyed polysynthetic constructions, and created phonemic redundancy. Yet print's prestige has been so great for three hundred years that speech has imitated it, and ignored those aspects of English that print couldn't reproduce.

By the eighteenth century scholars talked as if they were reading aloud. Here's a passage from Tristram Shandy whose author, Laurence Sterne, was noted for having accurately recorded the "correct" speech of his day:

For this reason I have the greatest veneration in the world for that gentleman, who, in distrust of his own discretion in this point, sat down and composed (that is, at his leisure) fit forms of swearing suitable to all cases, from the highest provocation which could possibly happen to him, and such moreover as he could stand up to, he kept them ever by him on the chimney piece, within his reach, ready for use.

Seventy-six words—a literary written expression. This was fine for philosophical discussion, but it must have made dry going at the breakfast table.

By Victorian times genteel conversation had become witty and slick, while that of the illiterate working man was considered not only vulgar, but wrong. What was considered "right" was nothing less than speech distorted by print. Oscar Wilde set the style in the love scene between Gwendolen Fairfax and John Worthing in The Importance of Being Earnest:

Jack: Charming day it has been, Miss Fairfax.

Gwen: Pray don't talk to me about

LOLLI POPS
"N OTHER CANDIES TOO!"

Sure kids love Barbados Molasses as a spread... and why shouldn't they when you consider that this Barbados beauty is actually sweeter than sugar and good for you too with iron, calcium and vitamin B₁. But right now, why not make up a batch of grand Barbados Molasses candies, including, of course, those all-time favorites—Molasses lollipops. Simple! I'll say, just follow this recipe: ... Then go buy more Pure Barbados Molasses... you'll certainly need it!

- 1 cup sugar
- 1/2 cup Pure Barbados Molasses
- 3 tablespoons butter or margarine
- 1/2 teaspoon salt
- 1/2 cup water

Combine all ingredients in a 2-quart saucepan. Stir until sugar is dissolved. Cook slowly to hard-crack stage (290°F.) or until syrup, when dropped in cold water, forms a hard, stiff ball. Drop from tablespoon onto end of wooden skewers arranged on buttered pan. Remove from pan when cold. But be sure the label says: "Pure Barbados Fancy Molasses."

Is it safe not to vote?

Re your editorial, If They Won't Vote, Don't Coax Them (Nov. 10): at first sight your arguments seemed good but, on reflection, don't you think that if we followed this policy it might result in Commies and sectional groups getting into power? These groups do vote and, unless we can get others to offset them by getting them to vote by any reasonable means, we will find ourselves in the shape of some other nations that have followed the policy you suggest.—ARTHUR J. REYNOLDS, TORONTO.

● Is it not possible for a reasonably intelligent and informed person, as a considered decision, to express his opinion in an election by abstaining from voting? This is done regularly in the United Nations . . . I think there are many occasions, at the polls and elsewhere, where it is justifiable not to take sides.—MRS. O. D. BILZ, PEMBROKE, ONT.

Arab refugees never had it so good

In her article, We've Earned the Arabs' Hatred (Nov. 10), Dorothy Thompson refers to "nearly a million Arab refugees, living for years now in mass camps, under inhuman conditions." There were never a million Arabs in Palestine. The refugees are now living under better conditions than they ever hoped to under normal conditions.—DR. A. SLOAN, OTTAWA.

The bridge that fell

I was very much interested in your article, The Black Day the Quebec Bridge Fell (Oct. 13), describing the three Quebec bridges and referring especially to the tragedy surrounding the first two.

I am enclosing a snapshot taken about July 24, 1915, on my way overseas. The second bridge was then under construction.—DR. NEWTON MAGWOOD, TORONTO.

Only champagne for Tumpane?

Frank Tumpane's article, I'm in Favor of Censorship (Nov. 24), was most amusing . . . Laws against sedition and blasphemy are absurd. A state that needs protection against seditious writing doesn't deserve to exist. As for blasphemy, a God who needs such a law obviously does not exist.

Tumpane's article shows that for the most part he is in favor of high-brow pornography, but opposed to low-brow pornography. He is in favor of champagne, but he turns up his nose at beer.—W. MCLEWEN, EDMONTON.

Do trees grow in mid-air?

The pictures on your covers have been anything but artistic. But the Oct. 27 deer-hunting cover by Peter Whalley is one of the worst. The way it is drawn—terrible! I have seen better drawing by grade-three students; at least their trees were rooted to the ground.—C. JOUDREY, MAHONE BAY, N.S.

Is the church meddling in Quebec?

I was much interested in your article, The "Religious Crisis" in Quebec Politics (Nov. 10). The political immorality in Quebec is not new to observers of this "isolationist" province . . . The unfortunate aspect of the whole thing is the policy of the clergy meddling in politics to the detriment of the social and economic life of the province . . .

No wonder that this province must be so different from the rest of Canada. I believe the answer is found in the remarks of Lord Macaulay over a century ago, when he said, "The Roman Catholics of Lower Canada remain inert while the whole continent around them is in a ferment with Protestant activity and enterprise."—A. A. FERGUSON, SYDNEY, N.S.

● I am glad to know that you do not hesitate to expose the unhealthy state of Quebec politics. Party after party follow the same routine of graft, corruption, bribery and intimidation. I know this happens in other provinces too, but it could never stand up to the degrading level it has reached in Quebec.—A. C. DANDURAND, MONTREAL.

● My opinion is that the Roman Catholic Church in Quebec is the government—or, in other words, Mr. Duplessis runs things as the church wants him to.—J. SADLER, OTTAWA. ★ the weather, Mr. Worthing. Whenever people talk to me about the weather I always feel quite certain that they mean something else. And that makes me so nervous.

Jack: I do mean something else.

Gwen: I thought so. In fact, I am never wrong.

Jack: And I would like to be allowed to take advantage of Lady Bracknell's temporary absence . . .

Gwen: I would certainly advise you to do so. Mamma has a way of coming back suddenly into a room that I have often had to speak to her about. Jack: (Nervously) Miss Fairfax, ever since I met you I have admired you more than any girl . . . I have ever met since . . . I met you.

Gwen: Yes, I am quite aware of the fact. And I often wish that in public at any rate, you had been more demonstrative. For me you have always had an irresistible fascination. Even before I met you I was far from indifferent to you. We live, as I hope you know, Mr. Worthing, in an age of ideals. The fact is constantly mentioned in the more expensive monthly magazines, and has reached the provincial pulpits I am told: and my ideal has always been to love some one of the name of Ernest. There is something in that name that inspires absolute confidence. The moment Algernon first mentioned to me that he had a friend called Ernest, I knew I was destined to love you.

If the twentieth century has done nothing else, at least it has branded the Worthings and Fairfaxes as outright menaces to a living language. By the 1920s the trade-mark of realism was a minimum of syntax, a maximum of understatement. Here, from what might be a modern novel in the Hemingway tradition, is an example:

General: Where is she, Harry?

Bartender: There.

General: No, the other one.

Bartender: Which other one?

General: The girl, Mignonette.

Bartender: Who?

General: You know who.

Bartender: Why do I know who?

General: It's almost always the other one with me.

Bartender: Yes, the other one.

General: Well?

Bartender: Over at La Chienne Morte.

General: Alone?

Bartender: Not alone.

General: There are people with her?

Bartender: Yes, there are people with her.

General: Who is this one?

Girl: I'm alone.

General: . . . Alone.

This could continue until the Nobel Prize is awarded.

In New York there's the Damon Runyon variation that features such immortal characters as the late Slat Slavins and Willie the Warbler. All of Runyon's characters speak in the present tense, even when the past or future are described. This is intentional, for as any good storyteller knows, the past is dead, the future doubtful. For a story to live it must have potentiality, which the past lacks, and it must appear to be true, which the future cannot do.

Comics, ads, radio and TV rarely employ anything but the present tense. They do this, not because of indifference to language or sloppiness in speech, but because of broad changes in our society that language is sensitive enough to record.

This timeless quality in language reflects a type of thinking where the before and after give way to the now. It's all there is: the past is summed up in it, the future implicit in it. Those who object to this use of the present tense are really objecting to the new type of life we are living, which is irrelevant to how language functions within that life.

Literate English emphasizes tenses reflecting chronological time: past, present, future. Oral languages rarely, if ever, do this; some lack tenses altogether. Moreover, written English emphasizes nouns. The first words our children learn are names for things: man, ball, dog. Oral languages, however, usually focus on actions and events.

Spoken English is changing in both of these respects. We no longer think in terms of Newton, but Einstein, not of free-flowing uni-dimensional time, but of the multiple perspective of modern art. TV and the newspaper front page. And our grammar is beginning to reflect this.

Radio, film and TV have smashed print's monopoly of English and set it free to become once more an oral language. Tones, for example, are a vital part of all oral languages. Some African groups can reduce a message to tones alone and then transmit it by "talking" drums. But our alphabet couldn't depict tones, and so tones gradually went out of English.

Are the dictionaries wrong?

For a time the manuscript tried to convey tones by spatial ordering—something like an e. e. cummings poem—but print destroyed even this. Punctuation was invented at this time as breathing notations for actors and orators, but later it was used as part of grammar, and today is employed with little reference to tone.

Look at the fate of Shakespeare's sonnets. His nineteenth-century editors thought, "Poor Will—a good poet, but he never went to college or learned to punctuate." So they changed his punctuation, making hundreds of unjustified emendations. But Shakespeare's punctuation had a deadly accuracy. He lived in an age when English was still primarily an oral language, when its tonal qualities were vital for meaning. His nineteenth-century editors, however, lived in an age in which print dominated English. Blindly following rules conceived in ignorance, they changed his punctuation and thus destroyed the meaning of hundreds of his lines.

Print also creates redundancy. English has forty-five phonemes, or minimal, meaningful sound units, but only twenty-six letters in the alphabet. To use this alphabet, it's necessary to link letters to represent sounds. Such linkages make English highly redundant. Electronic engineers have found that they can sometimes eliminate up to fifty-five percent of the letters in a message. Here's a sample: WENTYVE PRCT OF HE LTTRS I TIS SENTENCE HVEBEN DLETED AT RANM. We can read it without trouble or error. Written English can be drastically abbreviated without loss of intelligibility. Thus, "q" is always followed by "u"; why not drop the "u"—spell "queen" "qeen"?

We hear a lot nowadays about bad spelling, but are the misspellings in the students' essays or in the dictionaries? Students today do what monks did in the Middle Ages—spell words the way they sound, rather than the way they look. They obey their ears, not their eyes. The problem is intensified by the fact that spoken English is changing more rapidly than written English; the gap between them widens each year, leaving written English an archaic form.

Print is also unable to depict body gestures, which play a vital part in oral languages. A movement of the hand may be a modifier; a shift of the shoulder, a verb. When combined with spoken words, such movements—called "kines"—follow a genuine syntax. I wonder if an academician, living in a world of books, can ever understand why a boxer watches his opponent's eyes.

Movies and TV are aiding us in the recovery of this gesture and facial awareness. Educators who bemoan this type of communication, who cry "illiteracy," are in a broader sense themselves illiterate. They simply cannot understand those aspects of language that print cannot reproduce. Print enjoys great prestige; but let's be frank about it—if language is designed to communicate, then the most efficient form of communication is hardly the one that needs correction.

I offer no immediate solution to this problem, but I do suggest we stop criticizing students until we ourselves at least understand the problem. Our culture is changing; so is our language. It does no good to try to turn back the clock two hundred years and pretend we're sitting in the Mitre listening to Johnson and Boswell.

This nonsense about equating books with "true" culture, of ridiculing newspapers and TV because they are mass media, is grossly misleading. English is a mass medium. All languages are mass media. Radio, film and TV are just new languages, their grammars as yet unknown. Print was the first mechanized mass medium. Yet today it is being promoted by scholars as the only hope for true "kulcha."

Recently the Rt. Hon. Vincent Massey wrote: "As a means of serious communication, there is no substitute for the book . . . Books are above all others the means by which the individual may be nourished and a free society preserved . . . If books are, indeed, 'on the ropes' so are all the values of our civilization." The implication here is that not only are the values of our culture being replaced by new ones, but that the new ones are mean and vulgar.

Cyril Connolly, the English critic, put it more bluntly: "The more books we read, the sooner we perceive that the function of a writer is to produce a masterpiece and that no other task is of any consequence. All excursions into journalism, broadcasting, propaganda and writing for films, however grandiose, are doomed to disappointment. To put of our best into these forms is another folly, since thereby we condemn good ideas, as well as bad, to oblivion. It is in the nature of such work not to last, so it should never be undertaken."

These are the embalmers of language who want to lay thought to rest between hard covers. With the mortician's gleam, they come to bury the book, not to praise it. To them, the most useless communication is talk. Truth, science, democracy, even poetry and art, they believe, can exist and be transmitted only in visual form, as written language.

But great culture has never existed under a communication monopoly. The binding power of any monopoly stifles creativity. In the past when the oral and written traditions coexisted side by side, neither dominating the other, as in fifth-century Athens or the Elizabethan Age, the human spirit reached its highest moments. We live in similar times. Print's domination of thought has come tumbling down like the walls of Jericho. English is freeing itself to become an oral language. ★ have the highest birth rate and the lowest death rate in the world; once enrolled on UNRWA's ration list a person seems to become immortal, so few deaths are ever reported. Sixteen hundred calories a day are a mere subsistence ration, but in fact refugee families are able to save a fair fraction of the flour they get and barter it for clothes and other necessities. The effect of this leniency is that the refugees in Gaza, poor as they are, enjoy a relatively decent standard of living as Middle Eastern standards go. Israeli doctors, checking the health conditions in the refugee camps, found them surprisingly good. Housing is certainly not handsome, but it is no worse than in a typical Arab village—better, if anything. (The tidy huts in the Gaza Strip confirm suspicions that the horrible squalor of refugee camps in Jordan, along the road between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, is maintained as a kind of grisly tourist attraction to impress foreign visitors with the misery of the refugees.)

Among the women and children these tolerable material standards extend into a tolerable way of life generally. The women keep house, the children go to school. (Among the swarm of grinning, chattering urchins who surround every visitor from the moment he sets foot in Gaza, a surprising number speak English that they learned in the UNRWA school.)

UNRWA has carried on in Gaza a complete educational program for several years, with impressive results. Canadians and Americans who have spent time there on United Nations duty are all struck by the passionate interest in learning that they find among the Arab youth. They tell of seeing teen-agers walking the streets of the refugee villages to study until dark (there isn't much light in a camp hut) and doing their algebra in chalk on the sidewalk, or in the sand with match sticks.

But for the men, and for the young students as they grow into men, the refugee camps are a dead end. No intelligible future awaits them, or even an intelligible present. With nowhere to go, nothing to do, nothing to hope for and little to fear, they sit in a dream world of revenge and reconquest.

It is in the relative comfort of Gaza, not the shocking squalor of the tent camps in Jordan, that most recruits are found for the Fedayeen, the so-called commando squads of the Egyptian Army who in fact are simply trained murderers. The rising literacy rate, now at a new high as UNRWA schools produce their first crop of pupils who have had time to complete an elementary education, provides new thousands of readers for the inflammatory Arabic press. And with the almost total lack of hope for the future, release from worry about food and shelter brings more tension rather than less.

Of all the gunpowder lying loose in this explosive region, none is drier than the refugee camps of Palestine. They are a sobering spectacle to anyone who thinks that if we spend enough money, we can buy peace.

When the Israeli military governor took us to lunch at the mess in Gaza, he was embarrassed and apologetic about the swarms of flies, those horribly aggressive flies of the Middle East, that buzzed around the table. Soon, he said, he hoped to get time to do something about them.

This turned the conversation to the Rockefeller Foundation's experiment in upper Egypt a few years ago, which almost succeeded but eventually failed to wipe out flies in one village. Someone remarked, "Apparently there's no way to eliminate them in this part of the world."

The young military governor shook his head, with a reminiscent grin.

"There is a way," he said. "I have seen it done. It is not easy, but it is simple."

He went on to tell the story. During World War II he had served with the British Army in southern Burma, and in 1945 found himself in charge of a Japanese prisoner-of-war camp.

"Most orderly set of soldiers I ever saw," he said. "They made their own camp, including the wire fence around it to keep them from escaping, and compiled their own list of personnel and their own inventory of surrendered arms."

"The one thing wrong was the flies. Their camp was absolutely black with them, and of course they spread to our quarters, so I called in the Japanese commander."

"Flies?" he said. "You really think this important?"

"I told him I did. 'Ssss, ah,' he said.

"We shall remove the flies of course."

"Next day I found out how he proposed to do it. Orders were posted that every Japanese soldier, to get his ration of food, had to present one hundred flies, and a sergeant major sat at the head of the chow line counting them with a chopstick. After counting them he would dump them into a bin, so they could be used for fertilizer in the camp garden."

"Within two weeks, flies had become very scarce in the camp. The commander reduced the daily requirement to only fifty flies per man, but soon even that became very difficult. By the end of the fourth week, the camp had a black market in flies—men were paying quite large amounts for enough dead flies to get their daily food ration."

"Luckily the prisoners were sent home to Japan just in time. If they had stayed a fortnight longer, I'm sure some of them would have been breeding flies for commercial purposes."

The Israeli military governor pushed back his chair and took a last swat at the swarm on the dinner table.

"Maybe there's an idea there for UNRWA. Set a price of a few dozen flies for each refugee family's ration—they could wipe out one of the biggest public-health problems in Asia Minor." ★

"One thing is certain — Great Britain will no longer take its foreign policy from America" the view that the moment of destiny had arrived. The French government concurred. Like the crack of a whip the Anglo-French forces went into action to stop the Israel-Egypt war and to destroy the Russian armaments that were massed there. Those armaments proved to be better in quality and far greater in size than had been supposed. The estimate of the British forces is that they destroyed Russian tanks and airplanes to the value of a hundred million pounds.

Now we must turn to the White House for a moment. We in Britain, like you in Canada, are familiar with the smiling friendliness of President Eisenhower. As a soldier and as a statesman his good humor, his humanity and his warmth have won the hearts of his own people and the admiration of the whole civilized world.

When he learned that the Anglo-French forces had intervened without any consultation with the White House his anger grew to fury.

Some day we shall know exactly what Eisenhower and Eden said to each other on the telephone. One of the best-informed men in British politics told me that Eisenhower gave Eden absolute hell, and I do not doubt it.

But the debonair Anthony Eden is no tailor's dummy when it comes to a row. His father, the "Barking Baronet," had the hottest temper in his part of the countryside, and Anthony is a sprig of the old tree.

For better or for worse the British prime minister had decided to end Britain's role of satellite to the U.S. For weary sterile years Britain's ministers of state have commuted to and from Washington. At America's command Britain ended her long and loyal alliance with Japan. At America's command Britain ceased her valuable established trade with China. At America's command Britain supported the League of Nations, which was founded and then rejected by America. At America's demand we were burdened with the repayment of the 1914-1918 loan, which brought about the financial collapse and the general strike.

And now the British prime minister was being treated as an irresponsible warmonger. That was what we were told by a man who is in a position to know the truth.

Unhappily, Sir Anthony partially gave way to pressure and the Anglo-French attack stopped short of the objective, which involved seizing the canal.

It will be for the historian, not the contemporary journalist, to say whether it was wise or unwise to be content with a limited objective. At the moment it seems a thousand pities that we gave way to the pressure of America and the outraged morality of that international debating society whose very existence means delay, talk and impotence in the face of aggression. In case you have any doubt, I mean the United Nations.

Because of the Anglo-French failure to carry out its plan to the limit, Sir Anthony Eden was faced with a mutiny within the Conservative ranks by a group of Tory MPs led by Julian Amery, son of that great imperialist, Leo Amery, who passed away last year.

Julian Amery's group let it be known that if the Anglo-French forces were withdrawn prematurely at the behest of the UN they would vote against their own Conservative government.

Unfortunately Eden was ill and about to leave for Jamaica, so it was left to Rab Butler and Harold Macmillan to meet the Conservative members in a private conference room in the Commons.

There is a limit to what I can reveal, but the speech of Harold Macmillan, the chancellor of the exchequer, at that private meeting was a brilliant mixture of sincerity, irony and irresistible logic. In turn, Butler was clearheaded, firm and persuasive.

Macmillan discussed Anglo-American relations with a candor that left almost nothing to the imagination.

There is no reason to be diplomatic or mealy-mouthed about it. The direct action of France and Britain, without consultation with America, was a declaration of independence. The Americans should understand what that means because they became a nation by such a declaration.

What then is the position of Canada in the essential duality of her position as part of the British Commonwealth and part of the North American continent?

Let me answer by recalling that there was a most amusing book of the First World War called The Silences of Colonel Bramble. I see no reason why an enterprising publisher should not give us a modern book called The Silences of Mr. St. Laurent.

A shrewd and witty observer of the contemporary scene said the other day, "The only friends we have in Canada are the Canadian people." Dismiss it as a play on words, an epigram or just a joke. For myself I make no comment.

Therefore let us sum up the situation. The military intervention by France and Britain may have repercussions that will alter the very trend of history. One thing is certain — Great Britain will no longer take its foreign policy from America.

As for the UN, it will become an enfeebled giant without power to act unless another Truman arises to give it life.

Because of America's flabbiness of purpose there will be a mighty rejuvenation of Western Europe with the economic and military unity of Great Britain, West Germany, France, Italy and the Benelux countries.

We shall feel nothing but friendliness toward the American people and we shall do our best to make common cause with them in furthering the rights of human liberty and human dignity. We shall look upon America as a friend, a valued friend, but not an ally.

Forgive me if I end this London Letter on a personal note. In 1920 I wrote my first novel, The Parts Men Play, which was published simultaneously in the U.S., Canada and Great Britain. In the last chapter was the phrase: "America — debtor to the world."

Thirty-six years have passed by and I would not alter one word of what I wrote at that time. But perhaps I would add another chapter entitled: "The world is debtor to Anthony Eden, to Britain and to France." ★

Oscar Cahen

One of the last of Oscar Cahen's illustrations for Maclean's appears on pages 10 and 11 of this issue. Like the artist himself, it has gayness and spontaneity, as well as a sureness of touch that stamps it as the work of an extraordinary illustrator. It was one of the last jobs that Oscar did for us. He was killed in an automobile crash on November 26, 1956.

Oscar was not only one of Canada's best and best-known illustrators; he was a gallery painter of international renown.

In his ten years of association with Maclean's he did hundreds of covers and illustrations using half a dozen styles and techniques. He also painted and exhibited scores of important oils, one of which hangs in the National Gallery at Ottawa. As a member of Toronto's newly formed Painters Eleven, whose work recently went on exhibit in New York, he had established himself in the forefront of serious Canadian painters. His loss, therefore, is a great loss to all of Canada.

And even if he hadn't been able to paint a lick, all of those who knew and worked with him in this office would still miss him very much. ★

A warning about winter underwear

We have sworn testimony that when a Lethbridge, Alta., man fled the prairie winter for a Honolulu vacation he got there so fast he was still wearing his long winter underwear. After a trip to a Honolulu laundry the red flannels came back with a bill for $1.75—because the laundry, never having seen anything like them before, took no chances and dry-cleaned them.

Come sleet or drifts, motorists know they'll always be rescued on one sector of the Montreal-Toronto highway near Beauharnois. A service station there has the usual repair truck plus a small army tank—minus turret and cannon but armed with crane, winch and snowplow blade.

* * *

A motorist who is glad his garage has no equipment quite that heavy is a man in Watrous, Sask., who got into enough trouble as it was when he called a local service station to report that his car wouldn't start. The two fellows who came with the tow truck couldn't start it either, so they hauled it away for investigation. Well, the engine did start before they reached the garage, but they kept on going and just as they rolled inside the repair shop the man driving the customer's car discovered the brakes were frozen. Frantically he put the engine in reverse but not soon enough, as with a great crash car ran into tow truck. Still excited, the driver went to climb out, hit the gas pedal and rammed 'er backwards into the garage doors, which had just slid shut. Total damage, fortunately payable by the garage: $400.

Winter's upsets can embarrass little garage operators or giant railroads, although we must say the CNR asked for it when, during one of last winter's worst months, it ran a back-page ad in the Ottawa Journal: "Let it snow! Let it rain! Canadian National's Ocean Limited gives you fast train service to the Atlantic provinces . . ." On the front page of the same day's paper ran this terse report from Halifax: "Canadian National Railways said today its Ocean Limited from Montreal will arrive here 24 hours behind schedule because lines had been blocked by the severe week-end storm."

You've heard about all the stupendous deeds involved in getting the St. Lawrence Seaway built on schedule, in spite of all hazards, but bet you didn't know disaster was staved off in a small way a while ago by a small boy. He was eleven but not very big for his age—not as big as the other youngster he saw in front of him on the bridge over the Chateauguay River, just as this other youngster raised his arm to throw a rock. The rock was aimed at a seaman on the dredge L. Robidoux, working on a seaway channel directly below; but it never reached its mark because our hero knocked the off-fender's arm down just in time. His reward was immediate, fitting and appreciated: the seaman chucked the lad a chocolate bar he'd been about to eat himself.

The pee-wee hockey leagues are again going all out, of course, with practice sessions and games scheduled literally from pre-dawn to dusk to work in all the teams. Vernon, B.C., youngsters are as hockey crazy as those any place and we've heard about a junior Beliveau out there whose team had to be on the ice at 7 a.m. Saturday, and who pledged his dad to waken him no later than six. Father was rubbing his eyes sleepily when he went in to call the lad but wasn't too sleepy to notice the bedclothes looked awfully lumpy. Pulling them off he revealed the inert form of one small hockey player, fully clad, including shoulder pads, elbow pads, knee pads, sweater and hockey socks. No skates or stick—but they were right there within reach.

Whatever happened to those high button shoes?

Well, they disappeared with the heavy drapes, the gas lights, the drab wallpaper and the old style piano. Why? Because progress and the desire for a more comfortable way of life overtook them, with the result that today women are wearing fine, lightweight shoes for sports, dress and casual wear.

This development of the modern shoe could not have come about without synthetic rubber and its allied products.

Today synthetic rubber permits manufacturers to produce better products at a lower cost... synthetic rubber is better—that's why half of all new rubber used in Canada is...
